AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

1st CONGRESS.]

No. 1.

[1st Session.

MILITARY FORCE IN 1789.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 10TH OF AUGUST, 1789.

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE:

I HAVE directed a statement of the troops in the service of the United States to be laid before you, for your information.

These troops were raised by virtue of the resolves of Congress, of the 20th of October, 1786, and the 3d of October, 1787, in order to protect the frontiers from the depredations of the hostile Indians; to prevent all intrusions on the public lands; and to facilitate the surveying and selling of the same, for the purpose of reducing the public debt.

As these important objects continue to require the aid of the troops, it is necessary that the establishment thereof should, in all respects, be conformed, by law, to the constitution of the United States.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

NEW YORK, August 10th, 1789.

A statement of the Troops in the service of the United States.

The establishment, as directed to be raised and organized by the acts of Congress, of 3d of October, 1787, to wit:

3 Majors, each $12 per month,
1 Surgeon 6 do.
3 Regimental staff, each $6 do.

That, by the act of Congress, of the 31st July, 1787. Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Harmar was promoted to the rank of Brigadier General by brevet, with an allowance of the emoluments, but not the pay, of said rank.

That the emoluments are as follows, to wit:

Subsistence,	-	-	$64 per month,
Forage,	-	-	18 do.

That each non-commissioned officer and soldier is allowed, annually, one suit of uniform clothes, as follows: One coat, 1 vest, 2 pairs woollen overalls, 2 pairs linen overalls, 1 hat, 4 shirts, 4 pairs shoes, 4 pairs socks, 1 stock, 1 stock clasp, 1 pair shoe buckles, 1 blanket.

That each non-commissioned officer and soldier is also allowed one ration per day, to consist of the following articles:

1 pound of bread or flour,	1 quart salt,	} to every 100 rations.
1 pound of beef or $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of pork,	2 quarts vinegar,
1 gill of common rum.	2 pounds soap,
	1 pound candles.

That the troops in actual service are as follows:

Two companies of artillery, raised by virtue of the acts of Congress, of the 20th of October, 1786, and continued by the act of Congress, of the 9th of April, 1787, one of which is stationed at the arsenal at West Point, on Hudson river, and the other at the arsenal at Springfield, on Connecticut river, - - - - - 76

Troops stationed on the frontiers, as follows:

At the various posts northwest of the Ohio, - - - - - 596

Wanting, to complete the establishment, - - - - - 168

Non-commissioned and privates, - - - - - 840

That all the troops were enlisted for three years.

That the engagements of the two companies of artillery, at West Point and Springfield, will expire the beginning of the year 1790.

That, of the troops on the frontiers, enlisted by virtue of the acts of Congress, of the 3d of October, 1787, 528 non-commissioned officers and soldiers will have to serve, generally, to the middle of the year 1791; and two companies, consisting of 68 non-commissioned and privates, until towards the month of May, 1792.

That the change in the Government of the United States will require that the articles of war be revised and adapted to the constitution. That the oaths, necessary to be taken by the troops, be prescribed, and also the form of the commissions which are to be issued to the officers.

All which is humbly submitted to the President of the United States.

[2d SESSION.]

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 21ST OF JANUARY, 1790.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

The Secretary for the Department of War has submitted to me certain principles to serve as a plan for the general arrangement of the militia of the United States.

Conceiving the subject to be of the highest importance to the welfare of our country, and liable to be placed in various points of view, I have directed him to lay the plan before Congress, for their information, in order that they may make such use thereof as they may judge proper.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 21, 1790.

WAR OFFICE, January 18, 1790.

SIR: Having submitted to your consideration a plan for the arrangement of the militia of the United States, which I had presented to the late Congress, and you having approved the general principles thereof, with certain exceptions, I now respectfully lay the same before you, modified according to the alterations you were pleased to suggest.

It has been my anxious desire to devise a national system of defence adequate to the probable exigencies of the United States, whether arising from internal or external causes; and at the same time to erect a standard of republican magnanimity, independent of, and superior to, the powerful influences of wealth.

The convulsive events, generated by the inordinate pursuit of riches or ambition, require that the Government should possess a strong corrective arm.

The idea is therefore submitted, whether an efficient military branch of Government can be invented, with safety to the great principles of liberty, unless the same shall be formed of the people themselves, and supported by their habits and manners.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the most perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the Department of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

THE INTRODUCTION.

That a well constituted republic is more favorable to the liberties of society, and that its principles give a higher elevation to the human mind than any other form of Government, has generally been acknowledged by the unprejudiced and enlightened part of mankind.

But it is at the same time acknowledged, that, unless a republic prepares itself by proper arrangements to meet those exigencies to which all States are in a degree liable, that its peace and existence are more precarious than the forms of Government in which the will of one directs the conduct of the whole, for the defence of the nation.

A government, whose measures must be the result of multiplied deliberations, is seldom in a situation to produce instantly those exertions which the occasion may demand; therefore it ought to possess such energetic establishments as should enable it, by the vigor of its own citizens, to control events as they arise, instead of being convulsed or subverted by them.

It is the misfortune of modern ages, that governments have been formed by chance and events, instead of system; that, without fixed principles, they are braced or relaxed, from time to time, according to the predominating power of the rulers or the ruled: the rulers possessing separate interests from the people, excepting in some of the high-toned monarchies, in which all opposition to the will of the princes seems annihilated.

Hence we look round Europe in vain for an extensive government, rising on the power inherent in the people, and performing its operations entirely for their benefit. But we find artificial force governing every where, and the people generally made subservient to the elevation and caprice of the few: almost every nation appearing to be busily employed in conducting some external war; grappling with internal commotion; or endeavoring to extricate itself from impending debts, which threaten to overwhelm it with ruin. Princes and ministers seem neither to have leisure nor inclination to bring forward institutions for diffusing general strength, knowledge, and happiness; but they seem to understand well the Machiavelian maxim of politics—divide and govern.

May the United States avoid the errors and crimes of other governments, and possess the wisdom to embrace the present invaluable opportunity of establishing such institutions as shall invigorate, exalt, and perpetuate, the great principles of freedom—an opportunity pregnant with the fate of millions, but rapidly borne on the wings of time, and which may never again return.

The public mind, unbiassed by superstition or prejudice, seems happily prepared to receive the impressions of wisdom. The latent springs of human action, ascertained by the standard of experience, may be regulated and made subservient to the noble purpose of forming a dignified national character.

The causes by which nations have ascended and declined, through the various ages of the world, may be calmly and accurately determined; and the United States may be placed in the singularly fortunate condition of commencing their career of empire with the accumulated knowledge of all the known societies and governments of the globe.

The strength of the Government, like the strength of any other vast and complicated machine, will depend on a due adjustment of its several parts: its agriculture, its commerce, its laws, its finance, its system of defence, and its manners and habits, all require consideration, and the highest exercise of political wisdom.

It is the intention of the present attempt to suggest the most efficient system of defence which may be compatible with the interests of a free people—a system which shall not only produce the expected effect, but which, in its operations, shall also produce those habits and manners which will impart strength and durability to the whole government.

The modern practice of Europe, with respect to the employment of standing armies, has created such a mass of opinion in their favor, that even philosophers and the advocates for liberty have frequently confessed their use and necessity in certain cases.

But whoever seriously and candidly estimates the power of discipline, and the tendency of military habits, will be constrained to confess, that, whatever may be the efficacy of a standing army in war, it cannot in peace be considered as friendly to the rights of human nature. The recent instance in France cannot with propriety be brought to overturn the general principle, built upon the uniform experience of mankind. It may be found, on examining the causes that appear to have influenced the military of France, that, while the springs of power were wound up in the nation to the highest pitch, the discipline of the army was proportionably relaxed. But any argument on this head may be considered as unnecessary to the enlightened citizens of the United States.

A small corps of well disciplined and well informed artillerists and engineers, and a legion for the protection of the frontiers and the magazines and arsenals, are all the military establishment which may be required for the present use of the United States. The privates of the corps to be enlisted for a certain period, and after the expiration of which to return to the mass of the citizens.

An energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free republic, and not a standing army, forming a distinct class in the community.

It is the introduction and diffusion of vice, and corruption of manners, into the mass of the people, that renders a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence, and effeminacy of manners predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of the youth in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and riveted for ever.

While the human character remains unchanged, and societies and governments of considerable extent are formed, a principle ever ready to execute the laws, and defend the state, must constantly exist. Without this vital principle, the government would be invaded or overturned, and trampled upon by the bold and ambitious. No community can be long held together, unless its arrangements are adequate to its probable exigencies.

If it should be decided to reject a standing army for the military branch of the government of the United States, as possessing too fierce an aspect, and being hostile to the principles of liberty, it will follow that a well constituted militia ought to be established.

A consideration of the subject will show the impracticability of disciplining at once the mass of the people. All discussions on the subject of a powerful militia will result in one or other of the following principles:

First. Either efficient institutions must be established for the military education of the youth, and that the knowledge acquired therein shall be diffused throughout the community, by the mean of rotation; or,

Secondly, That the militia must be formed of substitutes, after the manner of the militia of Great Britain.

If the United States possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution, it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced, with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe a love of their country; reverence and obedience to its laws; courage and elevation of mind; openness and liberality of character; accompanied by a just spirit of honor: in addition to which their bodies will acquire a robustness, greatly conducive to their personal happiness, as well as the defence of their country; while habit, with its silent but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system.

Habit, that powerful and universal law, incessantly acting on the human race, well deserves the attention of legislators—formed at first in individuals, by separate and almost imperceptible impulses, until at length it acquires a force which controls with irresistible sway. The effects of salutary or pernicious habits, operating on a whole nation, are immense, and decide its rank and character in the world.

Hence the science of legislation teaches to scrutinize every national institution, as it may introduce proper or improper habits; to adopt with religious zeal the former, and reject with horror the latter.

A republic, constructed on the principles herein stated, would be uninjured by events, sufficient to overturn a government supported solely by the uncertain power of a standing army.

The well informed members of the community, actuated by the highest motives of self-love, would form the real defence of the country. Rebellions would be prevented or suppressed with ease; invasions of such a government would be undertaken only by mad men; and the virtues and knowledge of the people would effectually oppose the introduction of tyranny.

But the second principle, a militia of substitutes, is pregnant, in a degree, with the mischiefs of a standing army; as it is highly probable the substitutes from time to time will be nearly the same men, and the most idle and worthless part of the community. Wealthy families, proud of distinctions which riches may confer, will prevent their sons from serving in the militia of substitutes; the plan will degenerate into habitual contempt; a standing army will be introduced, and the liberties of the people subjected to all the contingencies of events.

The expense attending an energetic establishment of militia may be strongly urged as an objection to the institution. But it is to be remembered, that this objection is levelled at both systems, whether by rotation or by substitutes: for, if the numbers are equal, the expense will also be equal. The estimate of the expense will show its unimportance, when compared with the magnitude and beneficial effects of the institution.

But the people of the United States will cheerfully consent to the expenses of a measure calculated to serve as a perpetual barrier to their liberties; especially as they well know that the disbursements will be made among the members of the same community, and therefore cannot be injurious.

Every intelligent mind would rejoice in the establishment of an institution, under whose auspices the youth and vigor of the constitution would be renewed with each successive generation, and which would appear to secure the great principles of freedom and happiness against the injuries of time and events.

The following plan is formed on these general principles:

First, That it is the indispensable duty of every nation to establish all necessary institutions for its own perfection and defence.

Secondly, That it is a capital security to a free state, for the great body of the people to possess a competent knowledge of the military art.

Thirdly, That this knowledge cannot be attained, in the present state of society, but by establishing adequate institutions for the military education of youth; and that the knowledge acquired therein should be diffused throughout the community by the principles of rotation.

Fourthly, That every man of the proper age, and ability of body, is firmly bound, by the social compact, to perform, personally, his proportion of military duty for the defence of the state.

Fifthly, That all men, of the legal military age, should be armed, enrolled, and held responsible for different degrees of military service.

And sixthly, That, agreeably to the constitution, the United States are to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such a part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

THE PLAN.

The period of life, in which military service shall be required of the citizens of the United States, to commence at eighteen, and terminate at the age of sixty years.

The men comprehended by this description, exclusive of such exceptions as the Legislatures of the respective States may think proper to make, and all actual mariners, shall be enrolled for different degrees of military duty, and divided into three distinct classes.

The first class shall comprehend the youth of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty years of age; to be denominated the Advanced Corps.

The second class shall include the men from twenty-one to forty-five years of age; to be denominated the Main Corps.

The third class shall comprehend, inclusively, the men from forty-six to sixty years of age; to be denominated the Reserved Corps.

All the militia of the United States shall assume the form of the legion, which shall be the permanent establishment thereof.

A legion shall consist of one hundred and fifty-three commissioned officers, and two thousand eight hundred and eighty non-commissioned officers and privates, formed in the following manner:

1.—THE LEGIONARY STAFF.

One Legionary, or Major General.

Two Aids-de-Camp, of the rank of major; one of whom to be Legionary Quartermaster.

One Inspector and Deputy Adjutant General, of the rank of Lieutenant Colonel.

One Chaplain.

2.—THE BRIGADE STAFF.

One Brigadier-General.

One Brigade Inspector, to serve as an Aid-de-Camp.

3.—THE REGIMENTAL STAFF.

One Lieutenant Colonel Commandant.

Two Majors.

One Adjutant.

One Paymaster, or Agent.

One Quartermaster.

4.—TWO BRIGADES OF INFANTRY.

Each brigade of two regiments; each regiment of eight companies, forming two battalions; each company of a captain, lieutenant, ensign, six sergeants, one drum, one fife, and sixty-four rank and file.

5.—TWO COMPANIES OF RIFLEMEN.

Each company to have a captain, lieutenant, ensign, six sergeants, a bugle-horn, one drum, and sixty-four rank and file.

6.—A BATTALION OF ARTILLERY,

Consisting of four companies; each to have a captain, captain lieutenant, one lieutenant, six sergeants, twelve artificers, and fifty-two rank and file.

7.—A SQUADRON OF CAVALRY,

Consisting of two troops; each troop to have a captain, two lieutenants, a cornet, six sergeants, one farrier, one saddler, one trumpeter, and sixty-four dragoons.

In case the whole number of the advanced corps in any State should be insufficient to form a legion of this extent, yet the component parts must be preserved, and the reduction proportioned, as nearly as may be, to each part.

The companies of all the corps shall be divided into sections of twelve each. It is proposed, by this division, to establish one uniform vital principle, which in peace and war shall pervade the militia of the United States.

All requisitions for men to form an army, either for state or federal purposes, shall be furnished by the advanced and main corps, by means of the sections.

The Executive Government, or commander in chief of the militia of each State, will assess the numbers required, on the respective legions of these corps.

The legionary general will direct the proportions to be furnished by each part of his command. Should the demand be so great as to require one man from each section, then the operation hereby directed shall be performed by single sections. But if a less number should be required, they will be furnished by an association of sections, or companies, according to the demand. In any case, it is probable that mutual convenience may dictate an agreement with an individual to perform the service required. If, however, no agreement can be made, one must be detached by an indiscriminate draught, and the others shall pay him a sum of money equal to the averaged sum which shall be paid in the same legion for the voluntary performance of the service required.

In case any sections or companies of a legion, after having furnished its own quota, should have more men willing to engage for the service required, other companies of the same legion shall have permission to engage them. The same rule to extend to the different legions in the State.

The legionary general must be responsible to the commander-in-chief of the militia of the State that the men furnished are according to the description, and that they are equipped in the manner, and marched to the rendezvous, conformably to the orders for that purpose.

The men who may be draughted shall not serve more than three years at one time.

Reserved corps, being destined for the domestic defence of the State, shall not be obliged to furnish men, excepting in cases of actual invasion or rebellion; and then the men required shall be furnished by means of the sections.

The actual commissioned officers of the respective corps shall not be included in the sections, nor in any of the operations thereof.

The respective States shall be divided into portions or districts; each of which to contain, as nearly as may be, some complete part of a legion.

Every citizen of the United States, who shall serve his country in the field for the space of one year, either as an officer or soldier, shall, if under the age of twenty-one years, be exempted from the service required in the advanced corps. If he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, then every year he shall so serve in the field shall be estimated as equal to six years' service in the main or reserved corps, and shall accordingly exempt him from every service therein for the said term of six years, except in cases of actual invasion of, or rebellion within, the State in which he resides. And it shall also be a permanent establishment, that six years' actual service in the field shall entirely free every citizen from any further demands of service, either in the militia or in the field, unless in cases of invasion or rebellion.

All actual mariners, or seamen, in the respective States, shall be registered in districts, and divided into two classes. The first class to consist of all the seamen from the age of sixteen to thirty years, inclusively. The second class to consist of all those of the age of thirty-one to forty-five, inclusively.

The first class shall be responsible to serve three years on board of some public armed vessel or ship of war, as a commissioned officer, warrant officer, or private mariner; for which service they shall receive the customary wages and emoluments.

But, should the State not demand the said three years' service during the above period, from the age of sixteen to thirty years, then the party to be exempted entirely therefrom.

The person so serving shall receive a certificate of his service, on parchment, according to the form which shall be directed, which shall exempt him from any other than voluntary service, unless in such exigencies as may require the services of all the members of the community.

The second class shall be responsible for a proportion of service in those cases to which the first class shall be unequal. The numbers required shall be furnished by sections, in the same manner as is prescribed for the sections of the militia.

OF THE ADVANCED CORPS.

The advanced corps are designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war, but they are, in all cases of exigence, to serve as an actual defence to the community.

The whole of the armed corps shall be clothed according to the manner hereafter directed, armed and subsisted at the expense of the United States; and all the youth of the said corps, in each State, shall be encamped together, if practicable, or by legions, which encampments shall be denominated the annual camps of discipline.

The youth of eighteen and nineteen years shall be disciplined for thirty days successively in each year; and those of twenty years shall be disciplined only for ten days in each year, which shall be the last ten days of the annual encampments.

The non-commissioned officers and privates are not to receive any pay during the said time; but the commissioned officers will receive the pay of their relative ranks, agreeably to the federal establishment for the time being.

In order that the plan shall effectually answer the end proposed, the first day of January shall be the fixed period, for all who attain the age of eighteen years, in any part, or during the course of each year, to be enrolled in the advanced corps, and to take the necessary oaths to perform, personally, such legal military service as may be directed, for the full and complete term of three years, to be estimated from the time of entrance into the said corps, and also to take an oath of allegiance to the State and to the United States.

The commanding officer, or general of the advanced legions of the district, shall regulate the manner of the service of the youth, respectively, whether it shall be in the infantry, artillery, or cavalry; but, after having entered into either of them, no change should be allowed.

Each individual, at his first joining the annual camps of discipline, will receive complete arms and accoutrements, all of which, previously to his being discharged from the said camps, he must return to the regimental quartermaster, on the penalty of — dollars, or — months' imprisonment.

The said arms and accoutrements shall be marked, in some conspicuous place, with the letters. M. U. S. And all sales or purchases of any of said arms or accoutrements, shall be severely punished, according to law.

And each individual will also, on his first entrance into the advanced corps, receive the following articles of uniform clothing: one hat, one uniform short coat, one waistcoat, and one pair of overalls, which he shall retain in his own possession, and for which he shall be held accountable, and be compelled to replace all deficiencies during his service in the annual camps of discipline.

Those who shall serve in the cavalry shall be at the expense of their own horses and uniform helmets, and horse-furniture; but they shall receive forage for their horses, swords, pistols, and clothing, equal in value to the infantry.

At the age of twenty-one years, every individual having served in the manner and for the time prescribed, shall receive an honorary certificate thereof, on parchment, and signed by the legionary general and inspector.

The names of all persons to whom such certificates shall be given, shall be fairly registered in books, to be provided for that purpose.

And the said certificate, or an attested copy of the register aforesaid, shall be required as an indispensable qualification for exercising any of the rights of a free citizen, until after the age of — years.

The advanced legions, in all cases of invasion or rebellion, shall, on requisition of lawful authority, be obliged to march to any place within the United States; to remain embodied for such time as shall be directed, not to exceed one year, to be computed from the time of marching from the regimental parades; during the period of their being on such service, to be placed on the continental establishment of pay, subsistence, clothing, forage, tents, camp-equipage, and all such other allowances as are made to the federal troops at the same time, and under the same circumstances.

If the military service so required should be for such a short period as to render an actual issue of clothing unnecessary, then an allowance should be made in proportion to the annual cost of clothing for the federal soldier, according to estimates to be furnished for that purpose from the War Office of the United States.

In case the legions of the advanced corps should march to any place in consequence of a requisition of the General Government, all legal and proper expenses of such march shall be paid by the United States. But, should they be embodied and march in consequence of an order, derived from the authority of the State to which they belong, and for State purposes, then the expenses will be borne by the State.

The advanced corps shall be constituted on such principles that, when completed, it will receive one-third part and discharge one-third part of its numbers annually. By this arrangement, two thirds of the corps will at all times be considerably disciplined; but, as it will only receive those of eighteen years of age, it will not be completed until the third year after its institution. Those who have already attained the ages of nineteen and twenty years will, in the first instance, be enrolled in the main corps.

But one half of the legionary officers to be appointed the first, and the other the second year of the establishment.

The officers of each grade in the States, respectively, shall be divided into three classes, which shall by lot be numbered one, two, and three, and one of the said classes, according to their numbers, shall be deranged every third year. In the first period of nine years, one-third part will have to serve three, one-third part six, and one-third part nine years. But, after the said first period, the several classes will serve nine years, which shall be the limitation of service by virtue of the same appointment; and in such cases, where there may not be three officers of the same grade, the limitation of nine years' service shall be observed. All vacancies occasioned by the aforesaid derangements, or any casualties, shall be immediately filled by new appointments.

The captains and subalterns of the advanced corps shall not be less than twenty-one, nor more than thirty-five, and the field officers shall not exceed forty-five years of age.

Each company, battalion, and regiment, shall have a fixed parade or place at which to assemble. The companies shall assemble at their own parade, and march to the parade of the battalion, and the battalions to the regimental parade; and when thus embodied, the regiment will march to the rendezvous of the legion. Every commanding officer of a company, battalion, and regiment, will be accountable to his superior officer that his command is in the most perfect order.

The officers to receive subsistence money, in lieu of provisions, in proportion to their respective grades, and those whose duties require them to be on horseback will receive forage in the same proportion.

Every legion must have a chaplain, of respectable talents and character, who, besides his religious functions, should impress on the minds of the youth, at stated periods, in concise discourses, the eminent advantages of free governments to the happiness of society, and that such governments can only be supported by the knowledge, spirit, and virtuous conduct of the youth—to be illustrated by the most conspicuous examples of history.

No amusements should be admitted in camp, but those which correspond with war—the swimming of men and horses, running, wrestling, and such other exercises as should render the body flexible and vigorous.

The camps should, if possible, be formed near a river, and remote from large cities. The first is necessary for the practice of the manoeuvres, the second to avoid the vices of populous places.

The time of the annual encampments shall be divided into six parts or periods, of five days each; the first of which shall be occupied in acquiring the air, attitudes, and first principles of a soldier; the second in learning the manual exercise, and to march individually, and in small squads; the third and fourth, in exercising and manoeuvring in detail, and by battalions and regiments; in the fifth, the youth of twenty, having been disciplined during the two preceding annual encampments, are to be included. This period is to be employed in the exercise and tactics of the legion; or, if more than one, in executing the grand manoeuvres of the whole body—marching, attacking, and defending, in various forms, different grounds and positions; in fine, in representing all the real images of war, excepting the effusion of blood.

The guards, and every other circumstance of the camp, to be perfectly regulated.

Each State will determine on the season in which its respective annual encampments shall be formed; so as best to suit the health of the men, and the general interests of the society.

The United States to make an adequate provision to supply the arms, clothing, rations, artillery, ammunition, forage, straw, tents, camp equipage, including every requisite for the annual camps of discipline; and also for the pay and subsistence of the legionary officers, and for the following general staff: One inspector general, one adjutant general, one quartermaster general, with a deputy for each State.

These officers will be essential to the uniformity, economy, and efficacy of the system, to be appointed in the manner prescribed by the constitution of the United States.

The quartermaster general shall be responsible to the United States for the public property of every species, delivered to him for the annual camps of discipline; and his deputy in each State shall be responsible to him.

At the commencement of the annual camps of discipline, the deputy quartermaster will make regular issues to the legionary or regimental quartermasters, as the case may be, of all the articles, of every species, provided by the United States.

The returns for the said articles to be examined and certified by the highest legionary or regimental officer, as the case may be, who shall be responsible for the accuracy thereof.

At the expiration of the annual camps of discipline, all public property (clothing excepted) shall be returned to the deputy quartermaster of the State, who shall hold the legionary quartermaster accountable for all deficiencies. All the apparatus and property so returned, shall be carefully examined, repaired, and deposited in a magazine, to be provided in each State for that purpose, under the charge of the said deputy quartermaster, until the ensuing annual encampment, or any occasion which may render a new issue necessary.

Corporal punishments shall never be inflicted in the annual camps of discipline; but a system of fines and imprisonment shall be formed for the regular government of said camps.

OF THE MAIN CORPS.

As the main and reserved corps are to be replenished by the principle of rotation from the advanced corps, and ultimately to consist of men who have received their military education therein, it is proper that one uniform arrangement should pervade the several classes.

It is for this reason the legion is established as the common form of all the corps of the militia.

The main legions, consisting of the great majority of the men of the military age, will form the principal defence of the country.

They are to be responsible for their proportion of men, to form an army whenever necessity shall dictate the measure; and on every sudden occasion to which the advanced corps shall be incompetent, an adequate number of non-commissioned officers and privates shall be added thereto, from the main corps, by means of the sections.

The main corps will be perfectly armed, in the first instance, and will practise the exercise and manoeuvres, four days in each year, and will assemble in their respective districts, by companies, battalions, regiments, or legions, as shall be directed by the legionary general; but it must be a fixed rule, that, in the populous parts of the States, the regiments must assemble once annually, and the legions once in three years.

Although the main corps cannot acquire a great degree of military knowledge in the few days prescribed for its annual exercise, yet, by the constant accession of the youth from the advanced corps, it will soon command respect for its discipline, as well as its numbers.

When the youth are transferred from the advanced corps, they shall invariably join the flank companies, the cavalry or artillery, of the main corps, according to the nature of their former services.

OF THE RESERVED CORPS.

The reserved corps will assemble only twice, annually, for the inspection of arms, by companies, battalions, or regiments, as shall be directed by each State. It will assemble by legions, whenever the defence of the State may render the measure necessary.

Such are the propositions of the plan, to which it may be necessary to add some explanations.

Although the substantial political maxim, which requires personal service of all the members of the community for the defence of the State, is obligatory under all forms of society, and is the main pillar of a free government, yet the degrees thereof may vary at the different periods of life, consistently with the general welfare. The public convenience may also dictate a relaxation of the general obligation as it respects the principal magistrates, and the ministers of justice and of religion, and perhaps some religious sects. But it ought to be remembered that measures of national importance never should be frustrated by the accommodation of individuals.

The military age has generally commenced at sixteen, and terminated at the age of sixty years; but the youth of sixteen do not commonly attain such a degree of robust strength as to enable them to sustain, without injury, the hardships incident to the field; therefore the commencement of military service is herein fixed at eighteen, and the termination, as usual, at sixty years of age.

The plan proposes that the militia shall be divided into three capital classes, and that each class shall be formed into legions; the reasons for which shall be given in succession.

The advanced corps, and annual camps of discipline, are instituted in order to introduce an operative military spirit in the community. To establish a course of honorable military service, which will, at the same time, mould the minds of the young men to a due obedience of the laws, instruct them in the art of war, and, by the manly exercises of the field, form a race of hardy citizens, equal to the dignified task of defending their country.

An examination into the employments and obligations of the individuals composing the society, will evince the impossibility of diffusing an adequate knowledge of the art of war, by any other means than a course of discipline, during the period of nonage. The time necessary to acquire this important knowledge cannot be afforded at any other period of life with so little injury to the public or private interests.

Without descending to minute distinctions, the body of the people of the United States may be divided into two parts—the yeomanry of the country, and the men of various employments, resident in towns and cities. In both parts it is usual for the male children, from the age of fourteen to twenty-one years, to learn some trade or employment, under the direction of a parent or master. In general, the labor or service of the youth, during this period, besides amply re-paying the trouble of tuition, leaves a large profit to the tutor. This circumstance is stated to show that no great hardships will arise in the first operations of the proposed plan; a little practice will render the measure perfectly equal, and remove every difficulty.

Youth is the time for the State to avail itself of those services which it has a right to demand, and by which it is to be invigorated and preserved. In this season, the passions and affections are strongly influenced by the splendor of military parade. The impressions the mind receives will be retained through life. The young man will repair with pride and pleasure to the field of exercise; while the head of a family, anxious for its general welfare, and perhaps its immediate subsistence, will reluctantly quit his domestic duties for any length of time.

The habits of industry will be rather strengthened than relaxed by the establishment of the annual camps of discipline, as all the time will be occupied by the various military duties. Idleness and dissipation will be regarded as disgraceful, and punished accordingly. As soon as the youth attain the age of manhood, a natural solicitude to establish themselves in the society, will occur in its full force. The public claims for military service will be too inconsiderable to injure their industry. It will be sufficiently stimulated to proper exertions, by the prospects of opulence attending on the cultivation of a fertile soil, or the pursuits of a productive commerce.

It is presumed that thirty days annually, during the eighteenth and nineteenth, and ten days during the twentieth year, is the least time that ought to be appropriated by the youth to the acquisition of the military art. The same number of days might be added during the twentieth as during the two preceding years, were not the expense an objection.

Every means will be provided by the public to facilitate the military education of the youth, which it is proposed shall be an indispensable qualification of a free citizen: therefore they will not be entitled to any pay. But the officers, being of the main corps, are in a different predicament. They are supposed to have passed through the course of discipline required by the laws, and to be competent to instruct others in the military art. As the public will have but small claims for personal services on them, and as they must incur considerable expenses to prepare themselves to execute properly their respective offices, they ought to be paid while on actual duty.

As soon as the service of the youth expires in the advanced corps, they are to be enrolled in the main corps. On this occasion, the republic receives disciplined and free citizens, who understand their public rights, and are prepared to defend them.

The main corps is instituted to preserve and circulate throughout the community the military discipline, acquired in the advanced corps; to arm the people, and fix firmly, by practice and habit, those forms and maxims which are essential to the life and energy of a free government.

The reserved corps is instituted to prevent men being sent to the field whose strength is unequal to sustain the severities of an active campaign. But, by organizing and rendering them eligible for domestic service, a greater proportion of the younger and robust part of the community may be enabled, in case of necessity, to encounter the more urgent duties of war.

It would be difficult, previously to the actual formation of the annual camps of discipline, to ascertain the number in each State of which it would be composed. The frontier counties of several States are thinly inhabited, and require all their internal force for their immediate defence. There are other infant settlements, from which it might be injurious to draw away their youth annually for the purpose of discipline.

No evil would result, if the establishment of the advanced corps should be omitted in such districts for a few years. Besides, the forbearance in this respect would lessen the expense, and render the institution more compatible with the public finances.

The several State Legislatures, therefore, as best understanding their local interests, might be invested with a discretionary power to omit the enrolments for the advanced corps, in such of their frontier and thinly inhabited counties, as they may judge proper.

If the number of three millions may be assumed as the total number of the inhabitants within the United States, half a million may be deducted therefrom, for blacks, and, pursuant to the foregoing ideas, another half million may be deducted, on account of the thinly settled parts of the country.

The proportion of men of the military age, from eighteen to sixty years inclusively, of two millions of people, of all ages and sexes, may be estimated at four hundred thousand. There may be deducted from this number, as actual mariners, about fifty thousand, and a further number of twenty-five thousand, to include exempts of religious sects, and of every other sort which the respective States may think proper to make.

Three hundred and twenty-five thousand, therefore, may be assumed, as the number of operative, fencible men, to compose the militia. The proportion of the several classes of which would be nearly as follows:

Firstly, The advanced corps, one-tenth composed of the youth of the ages of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty years,	-	-	-	32,500
Secondly, The main corps, six-tenths and one-twentieth,	-	-	-	211,250
Thirdly, The reserved corps, two-tenths and one-twentieth,	-	-	-	81,250

The following estimate is formed for the purpose of exhibiting the annual expense of the institution of the advanced corps, stating the same at thirty thousand men.

Estimate of the expense of the annual camps of discipline, as proposed in the foregoing plan, arising on each of the first three years, and, after that period, of the annual expense of the institution.

THE FIRST YEAR.

10,000 suits of uniform clothing, stated at eight dollars, each suit of which shall serve for the three years' discipline,	-	-	-	$80,000
10,000 rations per day, for 30 days, each ration at 10 cents,	-	-	-	30,000
The expense of four complete corps of legionary officers, of all descriptions, for 30 days, including pay, subsistence, and forage,	-	-	-	27,870

Forage for the cavalry,	-	-	-	-	$4,800
Straw, camp kettles, bowls, axes, canteens, and fuel,	-	-	-	-	20,000
Annual proportion of the expense of tents for officers and soldiers, which may serve for eight annual encampments,	-	-	-	-	3,000
Four legionary standards,	-	-	-	-	2,000
Regimental colors,	-	-	-	-	1,000
Consumption of powder and ball, shot, and shells, damage to arms and accoutrements and artillery, and transportation of the same, stated at	-	-	-	-	25,000
Hospital department,	-	-	-	-	5,000
Contingencies of the quartermaster's and other departments,	-	-	-	-	15,000
General staff, adjutant general, quartermaster general, inspector general, and their deputies,	-	-	-	-	12,000
Entire expense of the first year,	-	-	-	-	$225,670

ADDITIONAL EXPENSES ON THE SECOND YEAR.

10,000 rations per day, for 30 days, are 300,000 rations, at 10 cents,	-	-	-	-	$30,000
The expense of four complete corps of legionary officers, of all descriptions, for 30 days, including pay, subsistence, and forage,	-	-	-	-	27,870
Four legionary standards,	-	-	-	-	2,000
Regimental colors,	-	-	-	-	1,000
Forage for the cavalry,	-	-	-	-	4,800
Tents, straw, camp kettles, bowls, axes, canteens, and fuel,	-	-	-	-	20,000
Hospital department,	-	-	-	-	5,000
Contingencies in the quartermaster's and other departments,	-	-	-	-	15,000
Ammunition, damage to arms and accoutrements,	-	-	-	-	15,000
	-	-	-	-	$120,670
Expense of the first year,	-	-	-	-	225,670
Combined expenses of the first and second years,	-	-	-	-	$346,340

ADDITIONAL EXPENSES ON THE THIRD YEAR.

The expense of 10,000 rations, for 10 days, is 100,000 rations, at 10 cents,	-	-	-	-	$10,000
Forage,	-	-	-	-	1,600
For the camp equipage,	-	-	-	-	10,000
Tents,	-	-	-	-	1,500
Hospital stores,	-	-	-	-	1,000
Ammunition, damage to arms and accoutrements,	-	-	-	-	10,000
Contingencies in the quartermaster's and other departments,	-	-	-	-	10,000
	-	-	-	-	$44,100
Combined expenses of the first and second years,	-	-	-	-	346,340
The total expense of the first three years,	-	-	-	-	$390,440

It is to be observed, that the officers for four legions will be adequate to command the youth of eighteen, who commence their discipline the first year; and that the same number of officers will be required for the second year. The youth of the third year may be incorporated by sections in the existing corps, so that no additional officers will be required on their account.

Hence it appears that the expense of 10,000 men, for one year, amounts to

20,000 for the second year, to	-	-	-	-	$225,670
30,000 for the third year, to	-	-	-	-	346,340
	-	-	-	-	390,440

If the youth of the three ages of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty, be disciplined at once, the last mentioned sum will be about the fixed annual expense of the camps of discipline; from which, however, is to be deducted 6,000 dollars, being the expense of the standards and colors, the former of which will be of a durable nature, and the latter will not require to be replaced oftener than once in twenty years,

	-	-	-	-	6,000

The annual expense of the advanced corps,	-	-	-	-	$384,440
---	---	---	---	---	------------------

Thus, for a sum less than four hundred thousand dollars, annually, which, apportioned on three millions of people, would be little more than one-eighth of a dollar each, an energetic republican militia may be durably established, the invaluable principles of liberty secured and perpetuated, and a dignified national fabric erected on the solid foundation of public virtue.

The main and reserved corps must be perfectly organized, in the first instance, but the advanced corps will not be completed until the third year of its institution.

The combination of troops, of various descriptions, into one body, so as to invest it with the highest and greatest number of powers, in every possible situation, has long been a subject of discussion and difference of opinion. But no other form appears so well to have sustained the criterion of time and severe examination as the Roman legion. This formidable organization, accommodated to the purposes of modern war, still retains its original energy and superiority. Of the ancients, Polybius and Vegetius have described and given the highest encomiums of the legion. The former, particularly, in his comparative view of the advantages and disadvantages of the Macedonian and Roman arms, and their respective orders of battles, has left to mankind an instructive and important legacy. Of the moderns, the illustrious Mareschal Saxe has modelled the legion for the use of fire arms, and strenuously urges its adoption, in preference to any other form. And the respectable and intelligent veteran, late inspector general of the armies of the United States, recommends the adoption of the legion.*

"Upon a review," says he, "of all the military of Europe, there does not appear to be a single form which could be safely adopted by the United States. They are unexceptionably different from each other; and, like all other human institutions, seem to have started as much out of accident as design. The local situation of the country, the spirit of the government, the character of the nation, and, in many instances, the character of the prince, have all had their influence in settling the foundation and discipline of their respective troops, and render it impossible that we should take either as a model.

"The legion, alone, has not been adopted by any; and yet I am confident in asserting, that, whether it be examined as applicable to all countries, or as it may immediately apply to the existing or probable necessity of this, it will be found strikingly superior to any other.

"1st. Being a complete and little army of itself, it is ready to begin its operations on the shortest notice or slightest alarm.

"2d. Having all the component parts of the largest army of any possible description, it is prepared to meet every species of war that may present itself.

* Vide letter addressed to the inhabitants of the United States, on the subject of an established militia.

“And, 3d, as in every case of detachment, the first constitutional principle will be preserved, and the embarrassments of draughting and detail, which in armies differently framed, too often distract the commanding officer, will be avoided.

“It may easily suggest itself, from this sketch, that, in forming a legion, the most difficult task is to determine the necessary proportion of each species of soldiers which is to compose it. This must obviously depend upon what will be the theatre, and what the style of the war. On the plains of Poland, whole brigades of cavalry would be necessary against every enemy; but, in the forests and among the hills of America, a single regiment would be more than sufficient against any. And, as there are but two kinds of war, to which we are much exposed, viz. an attack from the sea side, by an European power, aided by our sworn enemies settled on our extreme left, and an invasion of our back settlements by an Indian enemy, it follows, of course, that musketeers and light infantry should make the greatest part of your army.”

The institution of the section is intended to interest the patriotism and pride of every individual in the militia, to support the legal measures of a free Government, to render every man active in the public cause, by introducing the spirit of emulation, and a degree of personal responsibility.

The common mode of recruiting is attended with too great destruction of morals to be tolerated; and is too uncertain to be the principal resource of a wise nation in time of danger. The public faith is frequently wounded by unworthy individuals, who hold out delusive promises, which can never be realized. By such means, an unprincipled banditti are often collected, for the purpose of defending every thing that should be dear to freemen. The consequences are natural: such men either desert in time of danger, or are ever ready, on the slightest disgust, to turn their arms against their country.

By the establishment of the sections, an ample and permanent source is opened, whence the State, in every exigence, may be supplied with men whose all depends upon the prosperity of their country.

In cases of necessity, an army may be formed of citizens, whose previous knowledge of discipline will enable it to proceed to an immediate accomplishment of the designs of the State, instead of exhausting the public resources, by wasting whole years in preparing to face the enemy.

The previous arrangements, necessary to form and maintain the annual encampments, as well as the discipline acquired therein, will be an excellent preparation for war. The artillery and its numerous appendages, arms and accoutrements of every kind, and all species of ammunition, ought to be manufactured within the United States. It is of high importance that the present period should be embraced to establish adequate institutions to produce the necessary apparatus of war.

It is unworthy the dignity of a rising and free empire, to depend on foreign and fortuitous supplies of the essential means of defence.

The clothing for the troops could with ease be manufactured within the United States, and the establishment in that respect would tend to the encouragement of important manufactures.

The disbursements made in each State for the rations, forage, and other necessary articles for the annual camps of discipline, would most beneficially circulate the money arising from the public revenue.

The local circumstances of the United States, their numerous sea-ports, and the protection of their commerce require a naval arrangement. Hence the necessity of the proposed plan, embracing the idea of the States obtaining men on republican principles for the marine as well as the land service. But one may be accomplished with much greater facility than the other, as the preparation of a soldier for the field requires a degree of discipline, which cannot be learned without much time and labor; whereas the common course of sea-service, on board of merchant vessels, differs but little from the service required on board of armed ships; therefore, the education for war, in this respect, will be obtained without any expense to the State. All that seems to be requisite on the head of marine service is, that an efficient regulation should be established in the respective States, to register all actual seamen, and to render those of a certain age amenable to the public for personal service, if demanded within a given period.

The constitutions of the respective States, and of the United States, having directed the modes in which the officers of the militia shall be appointed, no alteration can be made therein. Although it may be supposed that some modes of appointment are better calculated than others to inspire the highest propriety of conduct, yet there are none so defective to serve as a sufficient reason for rejecting an efficient system for the militia. It is certain that the choice of officers is the point on which the reputation and importance of a corps must depend; therefore, every person who may be concerned in the appointment, should consider himself as responsible to his country for a proper choice.

The wisdom of the States will be manifested by inducing those citizens of whom the late American army was composed to accept of appointments in the militia. The high degree of military knowledge which they possess was acquired at too great a price, and is too precious, to be buried in oblivion. It ought to be cherished, and rendered permanently beneficial to the community.

The vigor and importance of the proposed plan will entirely depend on the laws relative thereto. Unless the laws shall be equal to the object, and rigidly enforced, no energetic national militia can be established.

If wealth be admitted as a principle of exemption, the plan cannot be executed. It is the wisdom of political establishments to make the wealth of individuals subservient to the general good, and not to suffer it to corrupt or attain undue indulgence.

It is conceded that people, solicitous to be exonerated from their proportion of public duty, may exclaim against the proposed arrangement as an intolerable hardship. But it ought to be strongly impressed that, while society has its charms, it also has its indispensable obligations. That, to attempt such a degree of refinement as to exonerate the members of the community from all personal service, is to render them incapable of the exercise, and unworthy of the characters of freemen.

Every State possesses, not only the right of personal service from its members, but the right to regulate the service on principles of equality for the general defence. All being bound, none can complain of injustice, on being obliged to perform his equal proportion. Therefore, it ought to be a permanent rule, that those who in youth decline or refuse to subject themselves to the course of military education, established by the laws, should be considered as unworthy of public trust or public honors, and be excluded therefrom accordingly.

If the majesty of the laws should be preserved inviolate in this respect, the operations of the proposed plan would foster a glorious public spirit, infuse the principles of energy and stability into the body politic, and give a high degree of political splendor to the national character.

No. 3.

[2d SESSION.]

TROOPS, INCLUDING MILITIA, FURNISHED BY THE SEVERAL STATES DURING THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 11, 1790.

WAR OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 10, 1790.

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War submits the statement, hereto annexed, of the troops and militia furnished, from time to time, by the several States, towards the support of the late war.

The numbers of the regular troops having been stated from the official returns, deposited in the War Office, may be depended upon; and in all cases where the numbers of militia are stated from the returns, the same confidence may be observed.

But, in some years of the greatest exertions of the Southern States, there are no returns whatever of the militia employed. In this case, recourse has been had to the letters of the commanding officer, and to well informed individuals, in order to form a proper estimate of the numbers of the militia in service; and although the accuracy of the estimate cannot be relied on, yet it is the best information which the Secretary of War can at present obtain. When the accounts of the militia service of the several States shall be adjusted, it is probable that the numbers will be better ascertained.

There are not any documents in the War Office from which accurate returns could be made of the ordnance stores furnished by the several States during the late war. The charges made by the several States against the United States, which have been presented by the commissioners of accounts, are, probably, the only evidence which can be obtained on the subject.

All which is humbly submitted to the House of Representatives.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

No. 4.

[1st SESSION.]

COURT OF INQUIRY ON GENERAL HARMAR.

FORT WASHINGTON, September 24, 1791.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose to your Excellency the proceedings of the court of inquiry which sat agreeably to the general order of the 14th instant, "to inquire into the personal conduct of Brigadier General Harmar, commanding officer on the late expedition against the Miami Indians."

The court have taken the utmost pains to investigate the subjects committed to them, and have expected that some persons would have attended from Kentucky, on the occasion, as mentioned in your Excellency's letter of the 15th. Finding no personal evidence come forward from that quarter, have this day closed the proceedings, and present to your Excellency their opinion as specially directed.

There are some depositions handed in, but, as they are not authenticated under the seal of any court of record, or by the prothonotary of any county, the court conceive they can only subjoin them to the proceedings for information to your Excellency, as they have been to the court. They are numbered 1, 2, 3, 4.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

RICHARD BUTLER, Major General, President.

His Excellency Major General ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Proceedings of a Court of Inquiry, held at Fort Washington, September 15th, 1791, agreeably to the order of the 14th inst. of which the following is a copy:

"A court of inquiry, of which Major General Butler is appointed President, and Lieutenant Colonels Gibson and Darke, members, will sit to-morrow, 12 o'clock, at the Southeast block-house, Fort Washington."

Major General RICHARD BUTLER, President.

Lieutenant Colonels GEORGE GIBSON, }
WILLIAM DARKE, } Members.

After orders, September 14th, Head Quarters.

"Lieutenant Warren, of the 2d United States' regiment, is appointed to record the proceedings of the court of inquiry directed to sit at Fort Washington, by the orders of this day."

W. SARGENT, Adj. General.

The court met, agreeably to the above order, and were duly sworn according to law. The following letter was read, from his Excellency Major General St. Clair, directed to Major General Butler, President of the court of inquiry:

"FORT WASHINGTON, September 15, 1791.

SIR:

"The court, of which you are appointed President, is ordered for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar, the commanding officer upon the late expedition against the Miami Indians.

"In the course of your investigations, all the circumstances of the campaign, from the time the army departed until it returned to Fort Washington, are to be taken into consideration. These will embrace the personal conduct of the General; the organization of the army; the orders of march, encampment and battle; the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, the 19th, and the 21st of October, and whether the said detachments were duly supported, and if not, the reasons which prevented the said support. The articles of war specify, that courts of inquiry shall not give their opinion on the merits of any case, excepting they shall be specially thereto required. This seems to be one of the cases in which an opinion is requisite; you will therefore please, sir, to take the opinion of the court on all, and every, of the points above specified, and convey the same to me when the inquiry shall be closed.

"Some evidences have been expected from Kentucky; whether they will attend or not, I cannot inform the court; but the principal officers of the militia who served in the army of General Harmar have had notice that the court would meet this day. I have heard from none of them, excepting Lieutenant Colonel Trotter, who writes to me that his attendance is doubtful; that Colonel Hall is gone to the Atlantic States, and he believes Colonel M'Mullen likewise."

Brigadier General Harmar, being called upon for his evidences, furnished the court with a list of persons, where-upon the court ordered them to be summoned to attend. The court then adjourned to meet at 3 o'clock P. M.

Three o'clock P. M.—The court met, agreeably to adjournment.

The gentlemen who were summoned, not being ready to give in their evidences, the court adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SEPTEMBER 16th.

The court met, agreeably to adjournment, and Major Ferguson being called in and sworn, deposed as followeth: That, sometime about the 15th July, it was determined to carry on an expedition against the Miami villages. One thousand militia from Kentucky, and five hundred from Pennsylvania, with what could be collected of the 1st United States' regiment, and one company of artillery, was to form the army. The militia from Kentucky began to assemble at Fort Washington about the middle of September; those were very ill equipped, being almost destitute of camp kettles and axes; nor could a supply of these essential articles be procured. Their arms were, generally, very bad, and unfit for service; that as he was the commanding officer of artillery, they came under his inspection, in making what repairs the time would permit; and as a specimen of their badness, he informed the court, that a rifle was brought to be repaired without a lock, and another without a stock. That he asked the owners what induced them to think that those guns could be repaired at that time? And they gave him for answer, that they were told in Kentucky that all repairs would be made at Fort Washington. Many of the officers told him, that they had no idea of there being half the number of bad arms in the whole district of Kentucky, as was then in the hands of their men. As soon as the principal part of the Kentucky militia arrived, the General began to organize them; in this he had many difficulties to encounter. Colonel Trotter aspired to the command, although Colonel Hardin was the eldest officer, and in this he was encouraged both by men and officers, who openly declared, unless Colonel Trotter commanded them, they would return home. After two or three days the business was settled, and they were formed into three battalions, under the command of Colonel Trotter, and Colonel Hardin had the command of all the militia. As soon as they were arranged, they were mustered; crossed the Ohio, and, on the 26th, marched, and encamped about ten miles from Fort Washington. The last of the Pennsylvania militia arrived on the 25th September. These were equipped nearly as the Kentucky, but were worse armed; several were without any. The General ordered all the arms in store to be delivered to those who had none, and those whose guns could not be repaired. Amongst the militia were a great many hardly able to bear arms, such as old, infirm men, and young boys; they were not such as might be expected from a frontier country, viz. the smart active woodsman, well accustomed to arms, eager and alert to revenge the injuries done them and their connexions. No, there were a great number of them substitutes, who probably had never fired a gun. Major Paul, of Pennsylvania, told him, that many of his men were so awkward, that they could not take their gun-locks off to oil them, and put them on again, nor could they put in their flints so as to be useful; and even of such materials, the numbers came far short of what was ordered, as may be seen by the returns. That, on the 31st September, the General with the continental troops, marched from Fort Washington, to join Colonel Hardin, who had advanced into the country, for the sake of feed for the cattle, and to open the road for the artillery. On the 3d October, the whole army joined, and was arranged in order of march, encampment, and battle; these would appear by the orderly-book, with this difference in the encampment—the space they were to occupy, when in order of battle; which was to be open, was always to be filled up with their fires, nor was any intervals to be left between battalions. This was done to prevent, in some measure, the cattle and horses from getting out of camp; and the sentinels round camp had orders not to let the cattle or horses pass out after dark, just before which time they were brought within their fires. Those precautions, aided by the care and industry of Mr. Wells and his assistants, succeeded well in preventing loss of cattle—he was informed there were only two oxen lost from the time the whole army took up the line of march, until it returned to Fort Washington; but he was sorry to say, it was not the case of the pack-horses: the generality of the people employed in that department, were ignorant of their duty, indolent, and inactive; nor was it in the power of the General to remedy these defects. The shortness of the time for assembling and organizing the army put it out of his power to look about and select fit characters; he was of course obliged to take those that offered. After he was in the woods it was out of his power to exchange them for better, and punishments for neglect of duty was out of the question. The principles upon which the horses were employed induced the drivers, who were chiefly parties in the business, to lose and otherwise destroy them, rather than return them to their owners; by this means the proprietors had a high appraisement paid them for their horses, and daily pay for services, until they were lost; by adding to the above the negligence of sentinels, he accounted for the number of horses lost, which, in his opinion, it was out of General Harmar's power to prevent.

After the army was arranged, they continued their march without any material occurrence, until the 13th, when the horse fell in with two Indians, and took one of them prisoner, who informed that the Indians were not in force at the Maumee village. This day they reached a place called the French Store, at which place, a Frenchman, who was then with the General as a guide, had lived. He informed that the village was about ten leagues distant. From this place, on the morning of the 14th, Colonel Hardin was detached with six hundred men, to endeavor to surprize the Miami village; the army moved at the same time, and although it rained the whole day, they continued their march with diligence until late. The horse were ordered to be tied up this night, to enable the army to move early the next day, which it did. This diligence of the army on its march induced him to believe, the General was endeavoring to guard against any disaster that might happen to Colonel Hardin, which he was of opinion would have been in his power: for Colonel Hardin had not gained more than four miles of the army, on the first day's march. On the 17th, the army arrived at the Miami village; here were evident signs of the enemy having quitted the place in the greatest confusion. Indian dogs and cows came into their camp this day, which induced to believe the families were not far off. A party of three hundred men, with three days' provision, under the command of Colonel Trotter, was ordered, as he understood, to examine the country around their camp, but, contrary to the General's orders, returned the same evening. This conduct of the Colonel's did not meet the General's approbation, and Col. Hardin, anxious for the character of his countrymen, wished to have the command of the same detachment for the remaining two days, which was given him. This command marched on the morning of the 19th, and was the same day shamefully defeated. Colonel Hardin told him, that the number which attacked him did not exceed one hundred and fifty, and that, had his people fought, or even made a show of forming to fight, he was certain the Indians would have run. But on the Indians firing, which was at a great distance, the militia ran, numbers throwing away their arms, nor could he ever rally them; Major Ray confirmed the same. He did not know what influenced the detachment on the 21st. But, from the enemy being flushed with success on the 19th, it became necessary, if in his power, to give them a check, to prevent the army from being harassed on its return; which they might have done, well readily be granted by every one who has the least knowledge of the Indians, and an army encumbered with cattle and packhorses, much worn down; and although the detachment was not so fortunate, as was reasonably to have been expected, yet he firmly believed it prevented the savages from annoying their rear, as they never made their appearance after. With respect to supporting that detachment, which consisted of four hundred chosen troops, he always believed them superior to one hundred and fifty Indians, which was the greatest number as yet discovered, had it not been for misconduct and disobedience of orders by the officers who were on the command. He understood that Major Ray's battalion had been advanced to cover them, which was as many as could possibly have been spared, taking into view that those in camp could not be depended on, and many were without arms, having thrown them away. To support with the whole army, was impracticable; the pack-horses being weak, and greatly reduced in numbers; the artillery horses very much reduced, and unable to undergo much more fatigue, but at the certain loss of the artillery; as it was, they were obliged to send to Fort Washington for horses to assist in hauling it in. The march of the army was as regular and well conducted, as was possible to be done with militia. With respect to the General's conduct, report says, that he was intoxicated all the campaign, and unable to execute the important duties of his station. He had mentioned his commanding the artillery, which was posted at the head of the centre column, and here the General chiefly was, during the march; of course he had an opportunity of seeing, and being with him through the day; in the morning he received his orders from him, and when they halted to encamp, he chiefly pointed out the ground where the artillery should be posted; his duty called him often to his tent, before they marched in the morning, and after they halted in the evening; in short, had he been given to drunkenness, he had as good an opportunity of seeing it as any other officer in the army. Yet he declared, that, from their leaving Fort Washington, until their return, he never saw General Harmar intoxicated, or so as to render him unfit for the execution of any duties. In him, and his abilities, as an officer, he placed the greatest confidence, never doubting his orders, but obeying with cheerfulness, being conscious they were the production of experience and sound judgment.

Question by the Court. What were your reasons for thinking punishment for neglect of duty out of the question?

Answer. The state of the army being such, that it obliged the General not to do any thing that would tend to irritate the militia.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the organization of the army was a judicious one—such a one as was well calculated for the security of the troops?

Answer. It is my opinion that it was the most judicious organization that could be made, and calculated for the interest of the United States.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the order of encampment was a judicious one, and that the extreme parts were so disposed as were calculated to give security to the army and its appendages?

Answer. I think no better disposition could have been made.

Question by the Court. Do you think the order of battle calculated so as to have been easy of execution and easily formed?

Answer. I think it was the best that could have been formed, and well calculated for covering the appendages of the army.

Question by the Court. Do you know the General's motives for making the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October?

Answer. I do not know the General's motives for making the detachment of the 14th, but I suppose it was for the purpose of surprizing the Maumee village, as we had taken an Indian the day before, who gave us information that the Indians were in great confusion there, and that they were not in force, and very much divided in their councils. We expected to surprize them before they separated.

Question by the Court. What were the movements of the army after that detachment was made?

Answer. We continued our march next day, until an express arrived to inform us that the Indians had evacuated the village; when we halted.

Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body and the detachment?

Answer. About four miles.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the army was within supporting distance when that detachment was made?

Answer. On the first day we were.

Question by the Court. Do you know what induced the General to make the detachment of the 19th?

Answer. The day preceding that on which the detachment was made, Indian dogs and cattle came into our camp, which led us to believe the Indians were near us, more especially as they had left their village in such haste. I suppose it was for the purpose of examining the country around the camp. A detachment of three hundred men, under the command of Col. Trotter, with three days' provision, was made on the 18th, with orders to continue out three days, but which nevertheless returned into camp the same evening. The General appeared displeased at their disobedience of orders. Col. Hardin, wishing to retrieve the character of the militia, asked the General's permission to take out the same detachment on the 19th, which was granted.

Question by the Court. What motives led Col. Hardin at such a distance as fifteen miles from camp?

Answer. I understood that he got on the trails of the Indians, and that he had discovered an Indian on horseback, about one mile from where he fell in with their main body.

Question by the Court. Upon hearing of the defeat of that detachment, did you understand that the General ordered any support?

Answer. I don't know that he did; the first intelligence of the defeat was brought us by those who were defeated, late in the evening.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for the detachment of the 21st, either from the General himself, or any of his confidential officers?

Answer. I do not know from the General, but it was my opinion, as well as that of other officers, that the defeat of the 19th had so panic struck the army, that, had the Indians attacked on the retreat, it might have been lost, which induced the General to send the detachment in the rear.

Question by the Court. Had the General ordered another detachment upon the ground, where the defeat of the 19th happened, do you think the militia would have gone, or would they have mutinied?

Answer. I am rather inclined to think they would not have gone.

Question by the Court. With respect to the general conduct of General Harmar in the course of the campaign, is it your opinion that it was judicious, and in every respect commendable?

Answer. I do think it was perfectly so; I have the greatest confidence in, and good opinion of, his military abilities.

Captain Strong being sworn, deposed: That he knew of no circumstance during the whole campaign that could, in his opinion, affect the military character of the General. That the organization of the army appeared, to his judgment, extremely judicious, and such he believed was the general opinion of the officers. That the order of march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all its parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, or perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that he had reason to believe, that those detachments were not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General; who had given orders, in each case, that were not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. With respect to support in the action of the 21st, was there any support ordered that you know of?

Answer. I was present when the order was given to Major Ray to move with his battalion to support Major Wylls.

Question by the Court. Do you know what distance they marched for that purpose, or how long they were gone from the army?

Answer. I do not recollect perfectly how long, but I think it was not long.

Question by General Harmar. Is it your opinion that the making the detachment under Major Wylls was attended with good consequences to the army, or not?

Answer. I think it was attended with useful consequences to the army.

The Court then adjourned to 3 o'clock P. M.

Three o'clock P. M. The Court having met, agreeable to adjournment,

Lieutenant Hartshorn was sworn, and deposed, That he knew of no circumstances, during the whole campaign, that could in his opinion affect the military conduct of the General; that the organization of the army appeared to his judgment extremely judicious, and such he believed, was the general opinion of the officers; that the order of march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all its parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, and perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that as to the question of support, he had reason to believe the detachment was not properly supported; but it was his opinion at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders, in each case, that were not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. Do you know, sir, in the course of the campaign, from the time the army left Fort Washington, until its return to that place, any circumstance that could militate against the military character of the General?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. Do you know of any unnecessary delays?

Answer. None at all; far from it, every thing was done to get forward the army.

Question by the Court. Does any instance of inebriety in the General come within your knowledge, during the course of the campaign?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. So far as you are a judge of the organization of the army, do you think it was proper and judicious?

Answer. So far as I could judge, I think it was extremely judicious.

Question by the Court. Had you any conversation with the officers of the army on the subject of the organization of the army?

Answer. I had, and with those who I think were judges, who thought it to be very good.

Question by the Court. Did the arrangement of march appear to be so connected as to be able to support each other in case of attack?

Answer. I think it did, and seemed no less judicious and military in all its parts.

Question by the Court. Did the extreme parts of the encampment appear to be so formed, as to be competent to cover the main body of the army in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. Perfectly so.

Question by the Court. Was you in the first engagement of the army?

Answer. I was in the action of the 19th of October.

Question by the Court. Was you in the detachment of the 14th?

Answer. I was not.

Question by the Court. Did the order of battle on the 19th appear to you to be a judicious one?

Answer. I think it was not a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Who was the officer who commanded the troops in that action?

Answer. Colonel Hardin.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you attack the enemy—was it in columns, or did you display in any regular order?

Answer. We were attacked in front of columns.

Question by the Court. When you were attacked, were you ordered to display, or form in any regular order?

Answer. No.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you oppose the enemy when you were attacked?

Answer. By endeavoring to form the line to charge them.

Question by the Court. What troops came within your notice that attempted to form when charged?

Answer. Not more than thirty federal troops, and ten militia.

Question by the Court. How many militia had you?

Answer. I don't know.

Question by the Court. What became of the rest of the militia?

Answer. They gave way and ran.

Question. Do you think that, if the militia in that action had been properly formed, and in time, they would have been sufficient to have beat the enemy?

Answer. They were.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment on the 14th?

Answer. It was supposed for the purpose of gaining the Maumee village before the Indians left it, as we were informed they were preparing to leave it.

Question by the Court. Is that your own opinion?

Answer. It is, and was the general opinion in camp.

Question by the Court. What was the result of the action of the 19th—were the continental troops and the ten militia defeated?

Answer. They were cut to pieces except six or seven.

Question by the Court. Do you know from head quarters, or from any principal officers of the army, what were the motives for making the detachment of the 19th?

Answer. It was for the purpose of overtaking a party of Indians, whose trails had been discovered.

Question by the Court. Was there any attempt made to support that detachment from the main body?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body of the army and the detachment attacked?

Answer. Fourteen or fifteen miles.

Question by the Court. From the conduct of the militia, do you think that the General had a right to expect any great support from them, if he had been attacked?

Answer. I don't think he had.

Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 21st?

Answer. I was not.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment of the 21st?

Answer. It was for the purpose of seeing if any Indians were in the village.

Question by General Harmar. Did you not think the detachment sent back under Major Wylls competent to engage any body of the enemy?

Answer. It was sufficient for any body of Indians in that country.

Question by General Harmar. To what cause was it owing, that the detachment did not succeed so perfectly as I could have wished for?

Answer. Because they did not obey your orders; they did not march at the time they were directed.

Question by General Harmar. Upon the first intelligence do you recollect any support I ordered?

Answer. I recollect you ordered a battalion, I think under Major Ray.

Ensign Morgan being sworn, deposed as followeth: That, as he did not join the army under the command of General Harmar until the 13th October, he was unacquainted with its progress until that time, when the army appeared in good order. As he was an ensign, and carried the standard every fourth or fifth day after his joining the army, he was frequently near the General, and always observed, as far as he could judge, the greatest propriety of conduct. As to the organization of the army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, they are perfectly explained in the general orders. As to the motives which influenced the General in sending out the different detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st, he was unacquainted—the opinion he took up concerning the one of the 14th was, that the General, finding the army discovered, resolved to make a push for the towns before they were abandoned, and as he could not do it with his whole army, formed the detachment on the 14th under Colonel Hardin; the motive for the detachment on the 19th he was utterly unacquainted with, that of the 21st, as he supposed, was to pick up any straggling Indians who might have come to the towns, to see what they had been about, but without an idea of the Indians being in force.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the party of militia that were attached to Major Wylls' detachment was sufficient to have defeated the Indians if they had done their duty?

Answer. If they had been together, I think they were.

Question by the Court. What time did you return to the army from the action of the 21st?

Answer. About 5 o'clock P. M. The action commenced soon after day-light.

Question by the Court. Did you see any thing of the detachment under Major Ray, on your return?

Answer. I saw only a party three miles from camp, under Captain Craig, that were going to our support.

Question by the Court. What was the disposition of the militia after you returned to the army—were they well affected to the service and orderly?

Answer. I think they were very disorderly, and very inattentive to their duty, and some appearances of mutiny among them, with both officers and men; and turned out, upon one occasion particularly, to oppose a punishment that had been ordered by the General.

Question by the Court. Do you remember any thing of General Harmar's ordering his cannon to fire upon them?

Answer. I remember that General Harmar once said, that if the militia behaved again in so scandalous a manner, that he would order his cannon to fire on them.

Ensign Britt being sworn, deposed: That with respect to the personal conduct of General Harmar, he knew that he was indefatigable in making arrangements for the execution of the plans which had been formed for the expedition; and he also knew that the difficulties were great which the General had to encounter in organizing the militia, and in endeavoring to establish that harmony, which was wanting in their commanding officers, Colonels Hardin and Trotter, which he accomplished apparently to their satisfaction; that he was at all times diligent in attending to the conduct of the officers in the different departments of the army, and that he was always ready to attend to such occurrences as were consequent to the same, and the necessary exertions to have his orders carried into execution, were not wanting; but that there were great deficiencies on the part of the militia, either owing to the want of authority in some of their officers, or from their ignorance or inattention; that the generality of them scarcely deserved the name of any thing like soldiers; that they were mostly substitutes for others, who had nothing to stimulate them to do their duty; that as to the dispositions for the order of march, form of encampment, and order of battle, they were matters which he, being a young officer, could say little about; he presumed they would answer for themselves; that the General's motives for detaching Colonel Hardin on the 14th October, when they were told they were but ten leagues from the Indian towns, he supposed to be, from information they received by a prisoner who was taken on the 13th, that the Indians at the Maumee village were in great consternation and confusion; and the prospects were, they might be easily defeated if found in that situation; that in order to support this detachment, the horses of the army were ordered to be tied up at night, so that the whole army might be ready to march early in the morning, which was done accordingly; and that when Colonel Hardin reached the village, the main body was not more than five or six miles in his rear; that the detachment under Colonel Trotter was ordered to reconnoitre for three days the neighborhood, to endeavor to find out the savages, who had fled from their towns; that this party returned the evening of the same day they started, and next morning Colonel Hardin marched with the same party, and fell in with the Indians; that an engagement ensued, in which he was routed owing to the cowardly behavior of the militia under his command; that the motives which he conceived led to detaching the party under Major Wylls on the 21st were, that the Indians having avoided engaging the whole army, would collect at their towns, and harass the rear and flanks, as much as possible on its return, and a stroke at them before they could assemble in large bodies would prevent their doing it with much effect; that the party accordingly met with the Indians, and a battle followed, in which numbers were killed on both sides; that the moment the news of this arrived in camp, Major Ray, with his battalion of Kentucky militia, was ordered to march to the support of Major Wylls, but that he did not proceed far before he returned.

Question by the Court. Did you at any time, in the course of the campaign, perceive that General Harmar was intoxicated?

Answer. I did not; I lived in the General's family, and should have known it had any thing of that kind happened.

Doctor Allison being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the army, the orders of march, encampment, and battle, were questions which would be more amply answered by a reference to the orderly book, than they could be from the mere relation of an individual, or from any other official information; that, as to the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, those were questions which, if answered at all, must be merely speculative opinions, which it was not always prudent to divulge, nor would they, in his judgment, be admitted as evidence, or even perused by any tribunal, and therefore were nugatory; and, as he had not the honor of being in the cabinet, it was utterly out of his power to give any other; that, as soon as the news arrived of the misfortune of the third detachment, a reinforcement was immediately ordered by the General, but whether it actually set out, or what induced it to return, he could not say, or whether sufficiently strong, he did not conceive himself a judge. His situation, as surgeon, prevented a minute attention to every, or, indeed, any of the arrangements of the army; yet, as far as they came within his view, or knowledge, they were judicious and uniform; that every attention was paid to the army by the General, in every situation; that every step was taken by him that prudence and military knowledge could suggest, the circumstances of the army would permit, or that necessity required.

Lieutenant Denny, being sworn, deposed: That General Harmar began his preparations for the campaign soon after the 15th July, and that every day was employed in the most industrious manner; that the calculations for provisions, horses, and stores, were immediately made out, and orders given accordingly; that great exertions were used by Captain Ferguson to get in readiness the artillery and military stores, and, indeed, every officer was busily engaged, under the eye of the General, in fitting out necessary matter for the expedition, but particularly the quartermaster; not a moment's time appeared to be lost. Fifteenth and 16th September the Kentucky militia arrived, but instead of seeing active riflemen, such as is supposed to inhabit the frontiers, they saw a parcel of men, young in the country, and totally unexperienced in the business they came upon, so much so, that many of them did not even know how to keep their arms in firing order; indeed, their whole object seemed to be nothing more than to see the country, without rendering any service whatever. A great many of their guns wanted repairs, and, as they could not put them in order, our artificers were obliged to be employed; a considerable number came without any guns at all. Kentucky seemed as if she wished to comply with the requisitions of Government as ineffectually as possible; for it was evident that about two-thirds of the men served only to swell their numbers. Nineteenth September, a small detachment of Pennsylvania militia arrived, and the 25th of September, Major Doughty, with two companies of federal troops, joined them from Muskingum. Governor St. Clair had arrived from New York the 22d, and the remains of the Pennsylvania militia came on the 25th. The militia, last mentioned, were similar to the other, too many substitutes. The General lost no time in organizing them, though he met with many difficulties. The colonels were disputing for the command, and the one most popular was least entitled to it. The General's design was to reconcile all parties, which he accomplished, after much trouble. The Kentuckians composed three battalions, under the Majors Hall, M'Mullen and Ray, with Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Trotter at their head. The Pennsylvanians were formed into one battalion, under Lieutenant Colonel Trumbley and Major Paul, the whole to be commanded by Colonel John Hardin, subject to the orders of General Harmar; that, on the 26th September, the militia marched on the route towards the Indian towns. The 30th, the General having got forward all the supplies that he expected, he moved out with the federal troops, formed into two small battalions, under the immediate command of Major Wylls and Major Doughty, together with Captain Ferguson's company of artillery, and three pieces of ordnance. On the 3d of October, General Harmar joined the advanced troops early in the morning; the remaining part of the day was spent in forming the line of march, the order of encampment and battle, and explaining the same to the militia field officers. General Harmar's orders will show the several formations. On the 4th the army took up the order of march as is described in the orders. On the 5th a reinforcement of horsemen and mounted infantry joined from Kentucky. The dragoons were formed into two troops; the mounted riflemen made a company, and this small battalion of light troops were put under the command of Major Fontaine.

The whole of General Harmar's command then may be stated thus:

3 battalions of Kentucky militia,
1 do. Pennsylvania do.	} 1133
1 do. Light troops mounted do.
2 do. Federal troops,	320
Total, 1453

The line of march was certainly one of the best that could be adopted, and great attention was paid to keep the officers with their commands in proper order, and the pack-horses, &c. as compact as possible. The order of encampment appeared to be well calculated not only for defence, but to preserve the horses and cattle from being lost; however, notwithstanding every precaution was taken, and repeated orders given to the horse-masters, to hople well their horses, and directions to the officers and men not to suffer any to pass through the lines, many of them, owing to the carelessness of the militia, and the scarcity of food, (though great attention was paid in the choice of ground) broke loose and strayed through the lines after night, and even passed the chain of sentries which encircled the camp, and were lost. Patrols of horsemen were ordered out every morning by day-light, to scour the neighboring woods, and to bring in any horses that might have broken through the lines; and a standing order directed the pickets to turn out small parties, and drive in every horse. This was done, he believed, to expedite the movement of the army. There was no less attention paid to securing the cattle every evening when the army halted; the guard, which was composed of a commissioned officer and thirty or thirty-five men, built a yard always within the chain of sentries, and sometimes in the square of encampment, and placed a sufficient number of sentries round the enclosure, which effectually preserved them; there was not more than two or three head lost during the whole of the campaign. On the 13th of October, early in the morning, a patrol of horsemen captured a Shawanee Indian. On the 14th October, Colonel Hardin was detached with 600 light troops, to push for the Miami village; he believed that this detachment was sent forward in consequence of the intelligence gained of the Shawanee prisoner, which was, that the Indians were clearing out as fast as possible, and that if they did not make more haste, the towns would be evacuated before their arrival. As it was impossible for the main body of the army, with all their train, to hasten their march much, the General thought proper to send on Colonel Hardin, in hopes of taking a few, before they would all get off. This night the horses were all ordered to be tied up, that the army might start by day-light, on purpose to keep as near Colonel Hardin as possible; the distance to the Indian towns, when the detachment marched ahead, was about thirty-five miles. On the 15th, every exertion was used to get forward the main body this day; they found that the advanced party had gained but very few miles. On the 16th, in the evening, met an express from Colonel Hardin, who had got into the village, informing the General that the enemy had abandoned every place. On the 17th, about noon, the army arrived at the Oneca towns; on the 18th, Colonel Trotter was ordered out with three hundred men, militia and regulars, to reconnoitre the country, and to endeavor to make some discoveries of the enemy. He marched but a few miles, when his advanced horsemen came upon two Indians and killed them. The colonel was contented with this victory, and returned to camp. Colonel Hardin was displeased because Colonel Trotter did not execute his orders, and requested the General to give him the command of the party; it was granted; and, accordingly, Hardin marched next morning; but, he believed he had not two thirds of his number when two miles from camp: for, to his certain knowledge, many of the militia left him on the march, and returned to their companies. Whether he knew it or not, he could not tell; but that he proceeded on with a determination to trace some fresh signs of the enemy. He believed the plan was merely to gain some knowledge of the savages. He at length came upon a party not exceeding one hundred, but was worsted, owing entirely, as he was informed, to the scandalous behavior of the militia, many of whom never fired a shot, but ran off at the first noise of the Indians, and left the few regulars to be sacrificed; some of them never halted until they crossed the Ohio. The army, in the mean time, was employed burning and destroying the houses and corn, shifting their position from one town to another; that, on the 21st of October, the army having burned five villages, besides the capital town, and consumed or destroyed near twenty thousand bushels of corn in ears, took up the line of march on the route back to Fort Washington, and encamped about eight miles from the ruins; that, about nine o'clock, P. M. the General ordered out four hundred choice men, militia and regulars, under the command of Major Wyllys, to return to the towns, intending to surprise any parties that might be assembled there, supposing that the Indians would collect to see how things were left. The General had felt the enemy, knew their strength, and calculated much upon the success of this enterprise; that it was the general opinion the force of the savages was nothing equal to this detachment, and unless by some such means, there was no possibility of getting any advantage of them; however, the best laid plan was in some measure defeated by the disobedience of the militia, who ran in pursuit of small parties, and left Major Wyllys unsupported. The consequence was, that the Major, with most part of the regulars, were killed; and our loss was equal, if not greater, than the savages; that the intention of this detachment was evident to all the army, and would have answered the fullest expectations, provided a due obedience had been observed on the part of the militia—to provide against disobedience of orders was what, he believed, no one would think of, and had it not been the case, the Major, in his opinion, might have returned crowned with laurels. That the main body waited for the return of this detachment, but, to their mortification, about eleven o'clock, A. M. of the 22d, a fellow who ran back from the field, gave them information of Major Wyllys' misfortune. General Harmar immediately despatched Major Ray, with his battalion, to the assistance of the parties, but the Major did not get the length, before he met Colonel Hardin returning to camp with his wounded. He was led to believe that about this time, the General lost the confidence he had in the militia; those of them among the dead, were of the best men; that the effective strength was very much reduced by sickness and otherwise; the regular troops did not furnish more than two hundred; they were, in his opinion, very insufficient, and he was also clearly of opinion that, had the enemy made an attack upon their camp that evening, or the morning following, the militia were so panic struck, that very few of them would have stood; the consequences that would have happened, stared every person with horror; the sick and wounded, and all the stores, artillery, &c. would have fallen a prey to the savages. That this was also the opinion of several of the principal officers, who advised General Harmar of the danger of attempting to return to the towns, from the time it would take up, and the probability that the delay would give the savages time to collect from distant quarters. He observed that the 22d October, was employed in fixing biers for the wounded, and in making repairs. He also observed that the frost had destroyed the food early on their march out, and that the horses of the army were now become very much reduced, so much so, that it was utterly impossible for the main body to perform any thing rapidly, and to get back upon the road which they had so lately passed, was attended with difficulty; he said that the greatest attention was paid, the little army was kept compact, and vigilance was the word from all who had any reputation to lose. That the militia, on their return, began to be refractory, showing great signs of a revolt, discharging their pieces in open defiance of the general orders; some of them, however, were detected and punished, which gave umbrage, and was afterwards the cause of many illnourished reports, spread without any foundation, to injure the General's reputation. He further observed that the army returned, by slow marches, back to Fort Washington; that General Harmar's conduct during the campaign was observed to be sober, steady, and attentive to the service, and as his duty required him to be frequently near the General, should certainly have discovered it, had he been at any time intoxicated, as has been reported. Every evening, as duly as the army halted, the General made his remarks for that day, and issued orders for the movement and arrangements for the next; and every morning he was found among the first prepared for the field.

SEPTEMBER 10th, 9 o'clock, A. M. The court met, agreeably to adjournment, and again adjourned to September 19th, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

SEPTEMBER 19th, three o'clock P. M.

The court having met again, adjourned to to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 20th.

The court having met, according to adjournment, —

Major Zeigler, being sworn, deposed: That some time had elapsed before the different corps and battalions could be organized, on account of rank—the militia officers disputing for the command; and, after a good deal of exertion by General Harmar, they commenced their march on the 30th September, 1790, the militia, under Colonel Hardin, having been sent on a few days before; and, on the 3d October, they joined the militia, and took up their line of march, and encamped as mentioned in the General's orders. He observed that the orders of march and encampment, motions, &c. &c. were such as would have done honor to the first officers either in America or Europe. All necessary precautions were observed, to gain the point General Harmar set out for. On the 14th of October he was ordered to advance with Colonel Hardin, commanding fifty rank and file of the federal troops, being part of six hundred men; at ten o'clock they took up their march, and, before they left the ground, the rest of the army was ordered to parade and follow them, which he remembered to have seen the army from an eminence, as he inclined towards the left with the column to which he was attached. The fifteenth, about three o'clock, P. M. they arrived at the Miami villages, and, at the same time, Colonel Hardin sent an express to General Harmar, to inform him that the villages were evacuated. It was his opinion that the motives for this manoeuvre was in consequence of a Shawanese which they took a few days before, and who acquainted the General that the Indians were ready to move away. The army arrived the seventeenth, in the forenoon; and that day, as well as the rest, they were all busy in destroying the Indian corn, &c. &c. He further observed, that, on the eighteenth, Colonel Trotter was detached with three hundred men of militia, including thirty federal troops, but that the Colonel returned the same day without bringing any information, and that, on the morning following, Colonel Hardin took command of the same party and advanced, to procure some knowledge of the enemy, and on his discovering the enemy, those which were in the rear would not come up and support those engaged in front, and very few of those in front stopped, but ran, and the militia fled in a shameful manner, and the few federal troops, not supported, fell a sacrifice; the Major said, that a sergeant of militia, behaving very improper at that time, could not be brought to trial, on account of a brother of his being a captain, and who made parties that would have been attended with bad consequences, should he be punished, as his brother declared he would raise some men, and bid defiance. That, on the 21st of October, 1790, after they had destroyed a great quantity of corn and five or six villages, they took up their line of march towards Fort Washington, and at night Major Wyllys was detached with four hundred choice men, in hopes to surprise a body that might be at the ruins—this party was supposed to be sufficiently strong for any number of the enemy embodied. Major Wyllys marched in three columns, with intention to join with the right and left columns at the Miami village, but that the column under the command of Major M'Mullen fell in with a small party of Indians; they followed them, and disobeyed the orders of Major Wyllys, in pursuing them; and leaving the others unsupported, and so was the left wing, which would not have been if they had joined them, as he supposed it to be sufficiently strong for that party. He also remembered very well being on picket, or commanding one of the wings as Captain au Carrée, when the first men arrived with the intelligence that their party had gained ground, and, at that very instant, General Harmar ordered Major Ray with his battalion to the assistance of those engaged, lest that information should not prove true, but he went but two miles or two and a half, then meeting the scattered detachment, returned, to the great surprise of General Harmar; that the success of the detachment was defeated in a great measure by the militia running a-head, and leaving Major Wyllys unsupported. The army remained this day in dressing and fixing the wounded—the militia behaving so bad in several instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them, otherwise he would have returned with the army; but as things were situated, it would have been running too great a hazard. The army returned back to Fort Washington; nothing appeared wanting on the part of the General; every attention was paid to the army to guard against surprise. The Major observed that there had been very injurious reports spread about General Harmar, but, if he was to be credited, he knew of nothing that could be alleged against him, or could that possibly injure his reputation in any respect—the good of the service appeared to be his constant study.

Question by the Court. I think, sir, you said, that, on the fifteenth, at three o'clock, P. M. you arrived at the Miami village. What did you do after your arrival there—were the militia in good order?

Answer. When we arrived we were very much fatigued; having marched twenty-eight miles that day, I directed that my own men should not go thirty yards from camp. The militia, like a rabble, strolled into the neighboring villages, in parties of thirty or forty, after plunder—such was the situation that one hundred and fifty warriors might have beat us off the ground.

Question by the Court. Did you see any desire in the militia to return to the ground where Major Wyllys was defeated, or do you suppose they would have gone had they been ordered to go?

Answer. I suppose they would not have gone—they appeared to be panic struck.

Question by the Court. Are you of opinion that the personal conduct of the General was regular, steady, and tended to the good of the service?

Answer. Undoubtedly so, and very much to the credit of the General.

Question by the Court. From your long knowledge of service, do you think that, from the complexion of the troops General Harmar had to organize, that the formation of the army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was.

Question. Do you think that the order of march, and encampment, was calculated to secure every part of the army and its appendages?

Answer. Yes, very much so.

Question by the Court. From your experience, do you think that the order of battle directed by General Harmar was judicious?

Answer. Yes, perfectly so.

Captain Doyle, being sworn, deposed: That, previous to the campaign going out last fall, every day was employed in the most industrious manner; on the arrival of the Kentucky militia, they were all much disappointed, that, instead of seeing complete riflemen, many were armed with old muskets, much out of repair; the General immediately ordered them repaired with all expedition. He referred the court, as to the line of march, to the General's orderly book, and informed the court, that the personal conduct of the General, through the campaign, was uniform and steady, and that, had the General's orders been strictly obeyed, he was confident he must have come home with honor. As to what influenced the General to make detachments he could not say; he was in the detachment of the 14th October, and that the behaviour of the militia in that detachment was very disgraceful; they ran from town to town in pursuit of plunder, contrary to orders, and, on the arrival of General Harmar at the town, two-thirds of them dispersed in the same manner. The General ordered cannon to be fired, merely to collect them, and he at the same time harangued the officers, informing them of the ill consequences of such conduct. That the General's not returning to the village, after the ill-success of the last detachment, he believed, was owing to his not having confidence in his army. At that time there was a great rumor in camp; the general voice was for returning; their horses were much worn down; and the militia showed great signs of revolt. The reports that the militia circulated after their return home, and which was much to the prejudice of General Harmar, was, he believed, owing to the General's having a few of them punished for disobedience of orders; he thought it certain that they had no grounds for their ill-natured reports, and that General Harmar would have been justifiable in arresting one or two of the most popular field officers, and sending them home with disgrace—but a thing of that kind he observed would have broke up the army. He knew of no part of the General's conduct, during the whole of the campaign, that could be censured, without it was showing too much lenity to the militia, and thanking them for their conduct, when they merited punishment.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the sending the detachment under Major Wyllys tended eventually to the preservation of the army?

Answer. I think the Indians would have harassed us very much, on our return, if that detachment had not been made.

Question by General Harmar. Did the enemy annoy the army at all after that detachment was made?

Answer. No, they did not.

Question by General Harmar. Did we see any Indians afterwards?

Answer. We did not.

Lieutenant Sedam, being sworn, deposed: That he had the honor of serving under General Harmar, last fall, on a campaign against the Indians of the Maumee village, and that he saw nothing in his conduct but what he thought, was very proper; that, relative to the organization of the army, he was but little acquainted, and therefore referred the court to the General's orderly book; that he was entirely unacquainted with General Harmar's motives for sending out the different detachments, and if those detachments were not properly supported, it did not appear to him to be the fault of the General, for the militia were a poor set, and behaved very ill upon all occasions; that after the first action, he heard Major Paul of the Pennsylvania militia say; he hoped General Harmar would not put any confidence in them, for he was sure they would not fight.

Question by General Harmar. When I was upon the return at Chillicothe, I ordered one of the militia to be whipped; I was informed that Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen said I had no right to punish them; did you hear me reprimand them for that conduct?

Answer. After the man was punished, I heard you say to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would send them both home with disgrace, for their bad conduct.

Ensign Armstrong, being sworn, deposed as follows: That the militia being ordered into battalions and organized, in which he knew the General met with great difficulty; that the order of march and encampment could be better ascertained by a reference to the orderly book, than any thing he could add on the subject; that the conduct of the militia, in every instance, seemed calculated to obstruct every measure adopted by General Harmar; that the conduct of the General, in every particular, was perfectly consistent and uniform, and every step taken by him appeared to be the dictates of prudence and sobriety; that what induced the General to send out the detachments was wholly unknown to him, and, therefore, unanswerable by him.

Captain Armstrong, being sworn, deposed: That on report being made to General Harmar, by Major M'Mullen and others, that the tracks of women and children had been seen on the route leading towards the Kickapoo towns, a Northwest course, and supposing the enemy had left their families and baggage not far distant from camp, General Harmar, on the morning of October 18th, detached Colonel Trotter, Colonel Hall, Major Ray, and Major M'Mullen, with thirty federal troops, the mounted infantry, part of the cavalry, and a detachment of militia, amounting in the whole to 300 men. After they had proceeded about one mile, the cavalry gave chase to an Indian, who was mounted; him they overtook and killed; before they returned to the column, a second one appeared, on which the four field officers left their commands, and pursued, leaving the troops near half an hour without any directions.

whatever. The cavalry came across the second Indian, and after wounding one of their party, killed him also. When the infantry came up to this place, they immediately fell into confusion, which he gained permission to leave them some distance on the road, where he formed an ambuscade. After he had been some time at his station, a fellow on horseback came to him, who had lost the party in pursuit of the first Indian; he was much frightened, and said he had been pursued by fifty mounted Indians. That on his telling this story to Colonel Trotter, notwithstanding his observations to him, he changed his route, marched in various directions until night, when he returned to camp. That on their arrival in camp, General Harmar sent for him; and after answering him many questions, ordered one subaltern and twenty militia to join his command. With those he crossed the river St. Joseph about ten at night, and with a guide proceeded to an Indian town, about two miles distant, where he continued with his party until the morning of the 19th. His party fired upon an Indian and retook from him two horses. About nine o'clock he joined the remainder of the detachment under Colonel Hardin. They marched on the route Colonel Trotter had pursued the day before, and after passing a morass about five miles distant, they came to where the enemy had encamped the day before. Here they made a short halt, and the commanding officer disposed of the parties at a distance from each other; after a half of half an hour, they were ordered to move on, and Captain Faulkner's company was left on the ground; the Colonel having neglected giving him orders to move on. After they had proceeded about three miles, they fell in with two Indians on foot, who threw off their packs, and the brush being thick, made their escape. He then asked Colonel Hardin where Captain Faulkner was? He said he was lost, and then sent Major Fontaine with part of the cavalry in search of him, and moved on with the remainder of the troops. That some time after, he informed Colonel Hardin a gun had fired in their front, which might be considered as an alarm gun, and that he saw where a horse had come down the road, and returned again; but the Colonel still moved on, giving no orders, nor making any arrangements for an attack. That some time after, he discovered the enemy's fires at a distance, and informed the Colonel, who replied, that they would not fight, and rode in front of the advance, until fired on from behind the fires; when he, the Colonel, retreated, and with him all the militia except nine, who continued with him, and were instantly killed, with twenty-four of the federal troops; that seeing his last man fall, and being surrounded by the savages, he threw himself into a thicket, and remained there three hours in day-light; during that time he had an opportunity of seeing the enemy pass and re-pass, and conceived their numbers did not amount to one hundred men; that some were mounted, others armed with rifles, and the advance with tomahawks only; he was of opinion that had Colonel Trotter proceeded, on the 18th, agreeably to his orders, having killed the enemy's sentinels, they would have surprised their camp and with ease defeated them—or had Colonel Hardin arranged his troops, or made any military disposition, on the 19th, that they would have gained a victory. Their defeat he therefore ascribed to two causes; the un-officerlike conduct of Colonel Hardin, (who he believed was a brave man) and the cowardly behavior of the militia; many of them threw down their arms loaded, and he believed that none, except the party under his command, fired a gun. What he saw of the conduct of the militia on that day, and what he felt by being under the command of a man who wanted military talents, has caused him to determine, that he would not willingly fight with the one, or be commanded by the other. That he referred the court to the orderly book, which pointed out the line of march, encampment, and battle.

Question by the Court. Are you clearly of opinion that, if the militia had done their duty, they were fully competent to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. I think they were fully so.

Question by the Court. According to your ideas, as an officer of experience, was the formation and arrangement of the different corps of the army by General Harmar, at the commencement of the expedition, judicious?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Did the line of march appear to you to be a judicious one, calculated for the protection of the army in all its parts?

Answer. I think so.

Question by the Court. Do you think the mode of encampment was calculated both for defence and protection?

Answer. As much so as any one that could possibly be adopted.

Question by the Court. What was your opinion of the General's order of battle?

Answer. I think it was a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the making the detachment of the 21st was in its consequences useful to the return of the army?

Answer. I can judge from circumstances only; that we were not harassed by the enemy afterwards.

Question by the Court. Do you know if any detachment was made for the purpose of supporting Major Wyllis?

Answer. As soon as information of the Major's misfortune arrived in camp, the General ordered all the troops under arms, but whether any detachment was made from them or not, I don't know.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose that if General Harmar had ordered the army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I am of opinion that, if a serious attack had been made, in fifteen minutes the militia would have deserted us, and left the federal troops and artillery to be sacrificed.

Question by General Harmar. Do you recollect the proceedings of the militia at Chillicothe, on our return?

Answer. I recollect your saying to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would post them, in their country, for their un-soldier-like conduct, and that they ought to be hanged.

Ensign Shamburgh being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the army under General Harmar was, as far as he was capable of judging in military affairs, exceedingly well; that the march, encampment, and order of battle, were also, in his opinion, very well planned; that he was not capable of judging of the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, but it was his opinion, at that time, that the General was apprehensive, that, as the savages had been successful in the preceding engagements, they would harass his army on his return; in consequence thereof he ordered the party commanded by Major Wyllis in order to check them, which he believed had its effect; he recollects that the different detachments sent, out were numerous, and he believed sufficient to fight such number of Indians as were then together, if the commanding officers thereof had taken more precaution. He had been told at the time, that Major Ray was ordered to support Major Wyllis, but he could not determine whether that officer had obeyed his orders. He observed that the loss of so many pack-horses was owing to the neglect of horse-masters; notwithstanding the repeated orders of the General on that head, it appeared to him as if they were parties concerned, and glad to lose their horses, because they had a very great appraisement for the same. He observed that he did duty in the ordnance department at that time, and had fifty pack-horses under his direction, which gave him an opportunity to know the negligence and incapacity of both horse-masters and drivers.

Question by General Harmar. Do you think after the last detachment was made under Major Wyllis, and the remains of his party returned to camp, that the militia would have gone back if they had been ordered?

Answer. I think not.

Question by the Court. Was the appearance of the militia, after the action of the 21st, orderly or disorderly?

Answer. Very disorderly.

Question by the Court. Was there any particular cause ascribed that you heard of for their disorderly conduct?

Answer. Not that I know of; the militia, both officers and men, seemed determined to go home, and said frequently, that ten federal regiments should not keep them.

Question by the Court. Did you observe whether the militia were as well treated as the federal troops?

Answer. Perfectly the same.

Ensign Gaines (who was captain of horse in General Harmar's expedition) being sworn, deposed: That, on the expedition, he was almost every evening at General Harmar's tent until the 24th October, when he was detached forwards to Fort Washington, and that, during the whole time, he did not see General Harmar in the least intoxicated with liquor, but that on the contrary the General conducted the army in a manner which in his estimation did him great honor. He further observed, that he had served on a number of expeditions against the savages, undertaken by the militia of Kentucky, and that he never saw in any of them, the like good order and military arrangement which accompanied General Harmar's expedition; he also observed that the people in Kentucky never alleged any charge against General Harmar, until Colonel John Hardin had acquitted himself, before a board of inquiry, of several charges exhibited against him, respecting his conduct on that expedition; that the populace finding nothing they could say to the prejudice of the Colonel would be believed, levelled their malice at General Harmar. He did not conceive that any thing would have been said against the General in that country, if a Baptist preacher's son, who resides there, had not been whipped in the army for disobedience of orders.

Question by the Court. I think you say you have been in several expeditions against the Indians—did the militia who were with General Harmar conduct better, or worse, than those in other expeditions?

Answer. Much better, Sir.

Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 19th?

Answer. I was.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that if the militia had been properly arranged in that action, and would have fought, that they would have been sufficient to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. Yes: for it appeared to me that the Indians were surprised—that if Colonel Trotter on the preceding day had not returned, he most certainly must have been in their camp, and completely defeated them: for I had taken two of their spies the day before, which appeared to be the only two they had out.

Question by the Court. Do you think that if General Harmar had ordered the army back, after the action of the 21st, that the militia would have gone?

Answer. They would not have gone willingly. I think in that case there would have been danger of mutiny. When the militia of Major Wyllys' detachment were ordered to march, they appeared to be unwilling to go, and some were so much so, as to cry.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the movement of the detachment under Major Wyllys, had a good effect in securing the army from being attacked and harassed on its return?

Answer. I think it had a very good effect.

Question by the Court. Did the Indians ever attack you afterwards?

Answer. Not while I continued with the army.

Captain Asheton being sworn, deposed: That the organization of General Harmar's army was a source of trouble and difficulty, arising from disputes among the militia officers for precedence; but when effected, was, in all its parts, systematic; that the organization of the army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, when duly considered, cannot fail to raise the General in the estimation of every military man; that it had been basely reported, that the General was in a state of intoxication nearly the whole of the campaign. This, he asserted to be a malicious falsehood; and he averred, that his personal conduct, during that time, will ever do him honor. He said, the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, could only be accounted for by the General himself; but he supposed, that the detachment under Col. Hardin, was sent in consequence of information gained from a prisoner taken on the morning of the 13th, and from a Frenchman employed as a guide, who reported, that it was something more than half a day's ride from a place called the French Store (at which place the army encamped the night of the 13th) to the Maumee villages. This detachment was supported by the whole army, and moved off the ground at the same time, with as much rapidity as possible, and arrived at the villages on the 17th, where the army encamped. On the morning of the 18th, I mounted guard in front of the encampment. In the course of that day, I was informed that a detachment of 300 men was ordered out under Colonel Trotter, with three days' provision, with orders to scour the country; but they returned the same evening to camp, without effecting any thing. Colonel Hardin, disgusted at the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and anxious to retrieve the lost honor of his countrymen, solicited the same command, which was granted. He marched on the morning of the 19th, while he was yet on guard, and was defeated the same day by the Indians. He could not say what influenced the General to send out a detachment on the 21st; but he observed that the Indians were flushed with success in the action of the 19th. That it had become necessary to give them a sudden check, in order to prevent the army from being harassed on its return; and that, if this was the General's intention, he was fully persuaded it had its desired effect. On the 21st, the army marched eight miles from the Maumee villages on its return. Late that night, a corps of 340 militia, and sixty of the federal troops, under the command of Major Wyllys, were detached, that they might gain the vicinity of the Maumee villages before the morning, and surprise any Indians who might be found there. The detachment marched in three columns, the federal troops in the centre, at the head of which he was posted, with Major Wyllys and Colonel Hardin in his front—the militia formed the columns to the right and left. From several delays, occasioned by the militia's halting, they did not reach the banks of the Omece till some time after sun-rise. The spies then discovered the enemy, and reported to Major Wyllys, who halted the federal troops, and moved the militia on some distance in front, where he gave his orders and plan of attack to the several commanding officers of corps. Those orders were not communicated to him. That Major Wyllys reserved the command of the federal troops to himself. Major Hall, with his battalion, was directed to take a circuitous route round the bend of the Omece river, cross the Pickaway Fort, (or St. Mary's) which brought him directly in the rear of the enemy, and there wait until the attack should commence with Major M'Mullen's battalion, Major Fontaine's cavalry, and Major Wyllys with the federal troops, who all crossed the Omece at, and near, the common fording place. After the attack commenced, the troops were by no means to separate, but were to embody, or the battalions to support each other, as circumstances required. From this disposition it appeared evident, that it was the intention of Major Wyllys to surround the enemy, and that, if Colonel Hall, who had gained his ground undiscovered, had not wantonly disobeyed his orders, by firing on a single Indian, the surprise must have been complete. The Indians then fled with precipitation, the battalions of militia pursuing in different directions. Major Fontaine made a charge upon a small party of savages—he fell the first fire, and his troops dispersed. The federal troops, who were then left unsupported, became an easy sacrifice to much the largest party of Indians that had been seen that day. It was his opinion that the misfortunes of that day were owing to the separation of troops, and disobedience of orders. After the federal troops were defeated, and the firing in all quarters nearly ceased, Colonel Hall and Major M'Mullen, with their battalions, met in the town, and, after discharging, cleaning, and fresh-loading their arms, which took up about half an hour, proceeded to join the army unmolested. He was convinced that the detachment, if it had been kept embodied, was sufficient to have answered the fullest expectations of the General, and needed no support; but that he was informed a battalion under Major Ray was ordered out for that purpose.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion, that, if the General had ordered the army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not think they would.

Lieutenant Kersey being sworn, deposed: That when the militia arrived at Fort Washington, they were formed into battalions, and properly organized. He knew that General Harmar had a great deal of difficulty to get them arranged: their arms and accoutrements were in very bad order. He wished to refer the court to the General's orderly book for information relative to the order of march. In his opinion, General Harmar's conduct was uniform, steady, and sober, during the whole expedition. He was also of opinion, that the detachment of the 14th was in consequence of information received from a prisoner, taken the morning before; which was, that the enemy were running away; and the detachment of the 19th, was to gain some knowledge of them; and the detachment of the 21st, was to surprise and take advantage of them; which, in his opinion, would have happened, had the militia attended to the directions and plan laid down for that enterprise. He observed, that the reduced state of the pack horses, notwithstanding every attention was paid to secure and keep them in good condition, rendered it impossible for the army to take any advantage of the enemy. The militia had proved that they were not to be depended upon; their dastardly behavior, in three instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them. He therefore determined to return, and not to hazard another engagement unless the enemy came in reach of the main body. That the army took up the march to return to Fort Washington, and it was with great difficulty that the General kept them together until they arrived there.

Question by the Court. From your knowledge of service, is it your opinion that the organization of the army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was.

Question by the Court. Do you think that all the movements of the army were so connected, as to be able to sustain each other in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Do you think, that, through the course of the campaign, the General's conduct was open and decisive throughout?

Answer. I think it was.

Question by the Court. Was the conduct of the militia tolerably regular, on their advance towards the Maumee towns?

Answer. It was more regular than it was on the return; but it was very irregular.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose it was necessary to make the detachment of the 21st, in order to prevent the Indians harassing the army on its return?

Answer. I think it was, and for that purpose.

Question by the Court. If the General had ordered the army to return to the towns, after Major Wyllys's misfortune, would the militia have gone?

Answer. I think they would not; they would have mutinied.

Question by the Court. Was the army harassed by the Indians after the 21st, on its return?

Answer. Not to my knowledge; I believe there was not one seen.

The court adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SEPTEMBER 21.

The court met, according to adjournment. Major Heart was sworn, and deposed: That General Harmar's conduct on his expedition in October, 1790, was at all times steady, calm, and deliberate, and was always attentive to the arrangements and applications made to him, and to the informations given, as far as came under his observation; that he was often at his quarters and marched in front of the right column, which was generally within fifty yards of him; that the organization of the army being published in the daily orders, would speak for itself; he however never heard an individual find fault with it, during the campaign, or point out any defects, except in the commissary and pack-horse departments, and in those the execution, and not the arrangements, were found fault with; that the order of march was in three columns, covered with front, rear, and flank guards, which order was generally preserved, and as well executed as could be expected with a body composed mostly of militia, and embarrassed with pack-horses; that the encampment was in a square, with the baggage, horses, cattle and stores in centre—guards were posted in such manner as to form a line of sentries round the whole, field officers appointed to dispose those guards, and to see duty well done, and they were so disposed as to prevent surprise, and had the horse department followed orders, would have secured the horses. As they had not occasion to form the line of battle, he could not determine how it would have been executed, but it was simple, easy to be understood, and universally approved. With respect to making the detachments, he had never been in council, and could only assign such motives as offered themselves at the time from a concurrence of circumstances. The detachment of the 14th, he presumed, at that time, was made in consequence of information obtained from a prisoner, that the Indians were confused and distracted in their counsels, and was designed to surprise them, prevent their concerting measures to unite, and attack them, and not give them time to secure their provisions and property, and that the desired effect was answered, so far as to prevent their securing so much as they would otherwise have done. The whole army was put in motion the moment the detachment moved off, and followed with as much rapidity as artillery and stores would admit of, to support the detachment; that the detachment of the 19th was made in consequence of repeated information of having discovered a trail of men, women, and children, and on the fullest assurance, as he was then informed, that the detachment was adequate for attacking the party they were in quest of a corps de reserve was ordered, but never came up. It was dark before information was brought to the General that the party were defeated, and a support could not be sent that night; a detachment was ordered to march next morning, but for what purpose, he could not say. The detachment of the 21st, he had every reason to believe, was made on the general system, viz: to find the enemy, and give them a check, to prevent their attacking and harassing the army on the retreat, and on that principle the detaching was inevitable; he did not know that any support was ordered; he was on the left, but he knew that the greater part of the detachment came in very soon after the intelligence of the defeat was brought, and it was too late for giving any assistance. He did not expect that the General would make a detachment to support them, after the repeated proofs that the militia would not stand, and he presumed the situation of the horses would not admit of returning with the army. He supposed the detachment calculated to cover itself, and doubtless would have happily succeeded, had the right and left columns obeyed the orders which it is said Major Wyllys had given. He knew of no one circumstance in the General's conduct, during the expedition, which ought to injure his reputation; and though the misfortunes of the 21st were to be lamented, yet he believed the salvation of the remainder of the army, the baggage, and stores, were due only to the making that detachment.

Question by the Court. On the arrival of the troops in camp, who were defeated on the 21st, do you think, from the state of mind the militia were in, that if the General had ordered the army back the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not know whether they would or not, but if they had gone, and not having any place to retreat to, I am of opinion they would have fled as soon as they were attacked, and have left the federal troops to be sacrificed.

The court then adjourned to to-morrow morning nine o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 22.

The court having met according to adjournment, directed the recorder to write the following letter to his Excellency General St. Clair:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR:

I am directed by the court of inquiry, now sitting in this place, to inform your Excellency, that the court have gone through the examination of all the witnesses that have been adduced, and that those from Kentucky, that were referred to in your Excellency's letter to the president of the court, have not appeared; the court are now ready to close their proceedings, unless your Excellency has information of any further evidence being ready, of which the court beg to be informed.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

WINSLOW WARREN, Recorder to the Court.

To his Excellency General ST. CLAIR.

To which letter his Excellency General St. Clair sent the following answer:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR:

You will please to inform the court that I know of no evidences here, other than those that have been before them, and that it is not probable those from Kentucky will come forward; I therefore see no reason why the proceedings should not be closed.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,

AR. ST. CLAIR.

MR. WARREN, Recorder to the Court of Inquiry.

Soon after the following letter was received:

SEPTEMBER 22, 1791.

SIR:

Since I wrote to you a moment ago, I have been informed that it is probable more testimony will be offered to the court in the course of this day. If the court then have not already closed their proceedings, I wish they would be pleased to defer it until to-morrow morning, of which you will please to inform them.

I am, sir, your humble servant,

AR. ST. CLAIR.

MR. WARREN.

To which the following answer was returned:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR:

I am directed, by the president of the court of inquiry, to inform your Excellency, that, in consequence of the last letter with which you was pleased to honor them, they have adjourned, to meet to-morrow, 9 o'clock A. M.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

WINSLOW WARREN.

His Excellency General St. CLAIR.

The court then adjourned to September 23d, 9 o'clock, A. M.

SEPTEMBER 23d.

The court met, according to adjournment, and no further evidences appearing, came to a resolution to close their proceedings.

The court having deliberately considered the evidence before them, separately and aggregately, are unanimous in the following opinion:

First, That the personal conduct of the said Brigadier General Harmar was irreproachable.

Second, That the organization of the army was calculated to support harmony, and give mutual confidence to the several parts.

Third, That the order of march (a copy of which is annexed to these proceedings) was perfectly adapted to the country through which the army had to pass.

Fourth, That the order of encampment and battle (plans of which are also subjoined) were judicious, and well calculated to give security to the camp, energy to the troops in case of attack, and simple in its execution.

Fifth, That there were just reasons for the detachments of the 14th and 19th of October; that the detachment of the 21st was made on good principles, and had the designed effect of securing the return of the army, and preventing the enemy from harassing their rear. That the General had ordered support for the said detachment in time, but that his orders were not properly executed; and that the conduct of the said Brigadier General Josiah Harmar merits high approbation.

RICHARD BUTLER, Major General, President.

Attest, WINSLOW WARREN,

Lieutenant, and Adjutant to 2d United States Regiment, Recorder to the Court.

The depositions No. 1, 2, 3, 4, have been handed in and read to the court; they have thought proper to subjoin them to their proceedings, for your Excellency's information.

Caleb Worley, of the county of Fayette, in the district of Kentucky, lieutenant in Colonel Paterson's battalion of Kentucky militia, maketh oath and saith: That this deponent served, as lieutenant, in a battalion of Kentucky militia, commanded by Major M'Mullen, on the late expedition undertaken against the savages of the Omece towns, and that he, this deponent, had very frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with Brigadier General Harmar, who commanded the whole forces so employed. And this deponent saith, that he never did, to the best of his knowledge, see the said General Harmar in a state of intoxication, nor wanting in that duty and attention which he owed to the safety and order of the troops under his command. And further saith not.

No. 4.

The affidavit of Colonel John Hardin, taken in consequence of a court of inquiry to be held at Fort Washington, respecting the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar, on the expedition against the Maumee towns, in October, 1790.

This deponent being first sworn, deposeth and saith: That, on his arrival with the Kentucky militia, at the mouth of Licking, he commenced an acquaintance with General Harmar; found, from his conversation, that he had the good of his country, and the expedition, very much at heart; business was carried on regular, and with as much expedition as the nature of the case would admit. About the first of October we proceeded on our march; after the line of march was formed, the General issued his orders regularly, and observed, very strictly, that they were executed. On our march there was an Indian prisoner taken, who gave information that the Indians and French were repairing the old fort at the Maumee town, and that the Indians were not likely to get any of the neighboring tribes to join them; this prisoner also informed us they did not know that General Harmar had any artillery. After receiving this information, the General, and this deponent, consulted upon the matter, and it was agreed to detach six hundred men, leaving all their heavy baggage, and march rapidly to the towns, hoping that the enemy would fly to their fort, provided the artillery was not discovered, and that six hundred rank and file would be sufficient to keep them in their fort until General Harmar arrived with the artillery and balance of the army. Accordingly, when the General was informed, by the guides, that they were within thirty or thirty-five miles of the towns, there was a detachment ordered to make ready, with all possible expedition. Those orders were so pleasing to the officers that they disputed who should go; and some cast lots, in order to settle the dispute. This deponent being honored with the command, left the General with his detachment, and saw him no more until he arrived at the Maumee village, which, he thinks, was about three or four days after he left him, during which time he heard no complaints of General Harmar. After the General's arrival at the Maumee village, and the Indians all fled, he expressed a very great desire to make his route by the Wea towns on the Wabash; for this purpose there was a council ordered to be held; but, before the council met, finding the Indians had stole, the night before, a number of the pack horses, and some of the light-horsemen's horses, there was a stop put to the business, and the thoughts of the route by the Wea towns laid aside. There was an old French captive that was taken, informed us that the Indians were scattered in the woods, and were not able by any means to fight us, and that they had not got any assistance from other tribes; this induced this deponent to solicit the General for a command of about three or four hundred men, to range the woods for ten or twelve miles, which he granted, and ordered the three hundred men to be furnished with three days' provisions. These orders were as pleasing to the officers and soldiers as the former. Colonel Trotter insisted he had been promised a command, and as it appeared this would be productive of something very clever, he wished to be indulged with the command of the detachment then ordered out; which was granted by the General, this deponent consenting thereto. Col. Trotter marched on the morning of the 18th of October, equipped for a tour of two or three days, in order to hunt up Indian camps. He returned on the evening of the same day, at the time the General and the deponent was about fixing of guards in order to captivate any of the enemy that might come to steal horses. The General appeared much displeased with the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and ordered the same party out again that evening, and for this deponent to go next morning and take charge of them. This deponent, agreeable to the orders given, collected what he could of the party next morning, and after proceeding about ten miles, fell in with a party of Indians, who began a very brisk fire on the detachment, who retired without making but very little resistance, notwithstanding all exertions to prevent them. This deponent, when he returned to camp, informed the General what had happened—that it was owing to the cowardly behavior of the militia; and insisted on another party's being sent to the battle ground. The General informed this deponent he would let him know in the morning. Accordingly, he told him that he had not completed the object that he was ordered to do, and that, if any thing should happen to prevent him, he should be reflected on, as he had been in the possession of the towns so long, and had not destroyed them; that he would first give orders for that purpose, and then he would be better able to judge what was best to be done. On the morning of the 20th, orders were given for destroying of the towns, which was executed accordingly; at this time the men appeared more timid than before. The General told this deponent he thought it would not answer a good purpose to go to the battle ground, as the men's spirits appeared to be very low at the hearsay of so many men being killed, and that the sight of the mangled bodies would make them much more so, and the Indians, if not able to fight us, would be gone, and that he should give orders to take up the line of march to Fort Washington. Accordingly, on the morning of the 21st, we left the towns, and began our march for the mouth of Licking, in about eight or nine miles encamped. The night being very clear, and the moon giving light, this deponent informed the General, that he thought it would be a good opportunity to steal a march on the Indians, as he had reason to believe they returned to the towns as soon as they knew the army had left it. The General did not appear fond of sending a party back; but this deponent urged the matter, informing the General, that as he had been unfortunate the other day, he wished to have it in his power to pick the militia, and try it again, and at the same time endeavored to account for the men's not fighting, and desired an opportunity to retrieve the credit of the militia. The General appeared not to be of opinion the enemy would return so soon, but told this deponent he might take about one hundred men and go back. This deponent replied, he did not wish to go back with less than five or six hundred men; the General answered, that the troops were very much fatigued, and that it would not answer any valuable purpose to send so many men. This deponent then left the General. In about half an hour he was sent for, when the General informed him that he intended to send Major Wyllys back, with all the federal troops that could be spared, saying, at the same time, they were the men that would stand to the work, and that he wanted about one hundred of our best militia. After some conversation between the General and this deponent, the latter went to Major Wyllys, and told him he did not like his going back with so few men; the Major also thinking the number too few, wished this deponent to speak to the General on the subject, which was done. Major M'Mullen and Major Hall were then sent for, and the design made known to them; they both appeared well pleased with the affair. It was then proposed what number of men would be sufficient; this deponent recommending from four to six hundred; they both concluded that four hundred men was fully sufficient; the General seemed perfectly satisfied that any number of troops that were thought adequate to the purpose should be ordered; accordingly, four hundred men, consisting of sixty regulars, three hundred foot militia, and forty horsemen, rank and file, properly officered, were ordered to be ready to march at midnight. This deponent was honored with the command of the militia. The troops marched agreeable to orders, about two o'clock, and after proceeding to the towns; they fell in with a party of Indians; a battle ensued (the result of which is generally known) as they returned, about one and a half miles before we got to camp. This deponent sent a horseman forward to inform the General what was done; and very shortly after he had despatched this horseman, met Major Ray, with about thirty men, who informed him there had come a horseman into camp, and had acquainted the General that the party was nearly all cut off; that the General had sent him with what men he could get out of the militia, to meet what had escaped of the detachment; that those with him was all that would turn out. This deponent informed the Major otherwise, and requested him to wait until Major M'Mullen, Major Hall, and Major Ormsby, should come up; that they were but a small distance behind, and he would go forward to the General. When this deponent arrived at camp, and informed the General what was done, he appeared to be well satisfied; he also asked the General if he would not send back another party to keep possession of the battle ground; he replied he would not divide his army any more. When this deponent insisted on the whole army's marching back, (no person being present except the General, Major Doughty, and this deponent) the General answered—you see the situation of the army; we are now scarcely able to move our baggage; it will take up three days to go and return to this place; we have no more forage for our horses; and if the Indians intend to collect, which he apprehended they would, from their success on the 19th, it would give them a great opportunity; that they had got a very good scouring, and he would keep the army in perfect readiness to receive them, should they think proper to follow; and finally concluded, that, under the present circumstances, it was best to move forward to fort Washington, and if the Indians did follow, he would make every exertion in his power to defeat their intentions. Major Doughty appeared perfectly to agree with the General in opinion. The bounds of the camp were made less; the army continued at the same camp until next morning. Orders were given to march at the usual hour, which was eight o'clock; during this time this deponent never heard any person express a desire to go back to the towns, except two soldiers of Major Ray's party, by the names of Miller and Hammond. Next morning, at the hour appointed to march, the General moved with the front of the army, and halted at a very small distance, litters not being ready for all the wounded. This deponent, with the rear guard, and many others, did not leave the camp until ten o'clock, when they moved on and joined the army; the whole then proceeded on towards fort Washington, with as much regularity as was observed in going out, until we came to the old Chillicothe, on Little Miami, when a number of the militia, contrary to orders, fired off their guns. This deponent endeavored to put a stop to such disorderly behavior, and commanded that those offenders that could be taken should be punished agreeable to general orders; and having caught a soldier himself in the very act of firing his gun, ordered a file of men to take him immediately and carry him to the six pounder, and for the drummer to tie him up and give him six lashes; this deponent was shortly after met by Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, and a number of militia soldiers, who in an abrupt manner asked him by what authority he ordered that soldier whipped; he replied, in support of general orders; on which a very warm dispute ensued between Colonel Trotter, Major M'Mullen, and this deponent. The General being informed of what had happened, came forward, and gave Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen a very severe reprimand, ordered the federal troops to parade, and the drummer to do his duty, swearing he would risk his life in support of his orders: the man received the number of lashes ordered, and several that were confined were set at liberty; numbers of the militia seemed much pleased with what was done. This intended mutiny being soon quashed, the army proceeded in good order to Fort Washington. When the army arrived at the mouth of Licking, the General informed this deponent he had determined to arrest some of the militia officers for their bad conduct, and send them home with disgrace; but this deponent opposed his intention, alleging that it would be a disgrace to the whole militia; that he would perhaps stand in need of their assistance on some future occasion, and it would sour their minds and cause them to turn out with reluctance; and that his discharging them generally with honor would answer a better purpose; the General readily indulged the request of this deponent. This deponent further observes, that during the expedition he never heard officer nor soldier find fault, or give the most distant hint of being displeased, with the General's conduct in any respect, nor charge him with cowardice or drunkenness, and expected the General had given general satisfaction; and what more confirmed his opinion, was, after their arrival at Fort Washington the General invited all the field and some other officers to dine with him, amongst whom was Colonel Trotter, Major Doughty, Major Hall, and Major M'Mullen; dinner being over, wine was introduced. The General stepping out on some occasion, Major Hall proposed drinking his health; it was unanimously agreed to, and with as much cheerfulness as any other health that was proposed; this deponent continued at Fort Washington a few days after, and never heard any person speak a disrespectful word of General Harmar, or find fault in the least with his conduct whilst on the expedition. When this deponent returned home in Kentucky, hearing such reports respecting the expedition, was much amazed, but concluded it arose from a want of knowledge and proper information, or from prejudice. This deponent further saith, that he looked on General Harmar to be a very brave and experienced officer. And further saith not.

[1st Session.

CAUSES OF THE FAILURE OF THE EXPEDITION AGAINST THE INDIANS, IN 1791, UNDER THE COMMAND OF MAJOR GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 8TH OF MAY, 1792.

MR. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, reported that the committee had, according to order, proceeded to examine all the papers furnished by the Executive Department relative thereto, sundry papers and accounts furnished by the Treasury and War Departments, with explanations of the same by the heads of those departments in person, to hear the testimony of witnesses upon oath, and written remarks by General St. Clair, upon the facts established by the whole evidence, and that, as the result of their inquiries, the committee had agreed to the following report:

The contract for the supplies of the army on the route from Fort Pitt, was made by Theodosius Fowler, with the Secretary of the Treasury, and bears date the twenty-eighth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety; that at the same time a bond, in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with Walter Livingston and John Cochran, securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract.

That, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; that, by letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the twenty-fifth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as the contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time, between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments; that, on the sixth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary at War, for supplying the troops with provisions until their arrival at Fort Pitt, and at Fort Pitt; a bond was at the same time entered into by the said William Duer for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatsoever.

That the act making provision for the defence of the frontiers received the signature of the President of the United States the third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one. That General St. Clair was appointed commander-in-chief of the army destined for the expedition on the fourth day of the same month, and on the twenty-eighth left Philadelphia for Fort Pitt, at which place he arrived the sixteenth day of April, and from thence proceeded to Lexington, and from thence to Fort Washington, where he arrived on the fifteenth day of May. At the time of the arrival of the General at Fort Washington, the garrison there consisted of seventy-five non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; the garrison at Fort Harmor of forty-five; at Fort Steuben of sixty-one; at Fort Knox of eighty-three; and on the fifteenth day of July the whole of the first United States' regiment, amounting to two hundred and ninety-nine non-commissioned officers and privates, arrived at Fort Washington, under orders from the commander in chief. General Butler was appointed the second in command, in the month of March, and immediately proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the recruiting service; that he arrived in Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, the twentieth of April, and continued there till the thirtieth of the same month; that he arrived at Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the ninth of May, and at Fort Pitt on the twenty-second of the same month. It appears that no moneys for purchasing supplies were furnished at Carlisle, which was the place of rendezvous, for the enlisted soldiery, on the ninth of May, and that Mr. Smith, agent for the contractor, was actively engaged in furnishing supplies for the troops, on credit.

It appears by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on the eighth of May, and it appears that, on the twenty-third of March, there was advanced to William Duer, upon the last mentioned contract, from the treasury, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars; that there was advanced upon the first mentioned contract, the sum of seventy thousand dollars, in the following sums, and at the following dates, to wit:

March 22d,	-	-	-	-	-	10,000 Dollars.
April 7th,	-	-	-	-	-	15,000 do.
April 25th,	-	-	-	-	-	15,000 do.
May 7th,	-	-	-	-	-	20,000 do.
July 20th,	-	-	-	-	-	10,000 do.

It appears from the correspondence of General Butler with the Secretary of War, from the ninth of May to the ninth of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects, in the quartermaster's and military stores department, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp kettles, cartridge boxes, packsaddles, &c. all of which articles were deficient in quantity and bad in quality.

The packsaddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use; the arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use, which circumstance rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt.

It appears that a great proportion of the powder supplied for the use of the army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson at Fort Pitt, with a howitzer, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder. On the ninth of June General Neville, another of the contractor's agents, informed General Butler that he had not, at that time, received any moneys from the contractors, for the purchase of provisions, &c. for the troops, and was obliged to supply them on credit; that the country furnished provisions in abundance at a cheap rate, when money was had for the purchase. That, shortly after this information was communicated to General Butler, at his request four hundred dollars were advanced to General Neville by the quartermaster, for the purchase of provisions for the troops. The troops arrived at Fort Pitt in the following order, to wit:

* See Nos. 6 and 9.

May 16th. Captain Slough sixty-nine men;
 May 18th. Captain Powers seventy-eight men;
 May 19th. Captain Cribbs forty men; same day, Captain Guthrie twenty-three;
 May 25th. Captain Armstrong seventy-six; same day, Captain Kirkwood sixty-seven;
 May 28th. Captain Snowden one hundred and one;
 June 2d. Captain Sparks eighty-three;
 June 3d. Captain Butler sixty-one; same day, Captain Brock eighty-two; same day, Captain Vanswearingen eighty-eight;

June 5th. Captain Pike seventy-three; total, including officers and privates, eight hundred and forty-two; and left that place in the following order: Major Ferguson, with Captain Armstrong's company, about the first of June; Captain Snowden, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with about five hundred men, 12th of July; and on the 22d August the last of the troops under the command of Captain Phelon, and General Butler, with the Quartermaster General, on the 26th of August.

It appears, that General Butler had orders from the Department of War to protect the frontiers with the troops under his command, and that the delays in sending forward the troops from Fort Pitt arose partly from that circumstance, and partly from the temporary want of supplies of provisions and other necessaries, and from the want of the necessary boats for their transportation, which were not in readiness as soon as the troops were. It appears, that General Butler acted with ability, activity, and zeal, in his command at Fort Pitt, and that the delays of the troops there cannot be imputed to his want of judgment, or his want of exertion.

The troops met with considerable difficulties and delays in going down the river from the low state of the water, and arrived at Fort Washington in the following order. Captain Mumford, from North Carolina, with about fifty men on the — day of —; Major Ferguson, with Capt. Armstrong's company, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Colonel Darke, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; and the Kentucky militia on the — day of —.

The army, consisting of about two thousand non-commissioned officers and privates, moved from Fort Washington, by orders from the commander in chief, to a place about five or six miles from thence, called Ludlow's station, where they continued till the seventeenth day of September, at which time the whole army amounted to about two thousand three hundred non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty. That, the price of rations at Fort Washington, agreeably to contract, was 6/90ths of a dollar per ration; the price of rations at Ludlow's station was 15/90ths of a dollar per ration.

That the inducements of the commander in chief to this movement appear to have been to furnish green forage for the horses and beef cattle of the army, to instruct the soldiery in field exercise, and other necessary discipline, and to deprive them of the means of intoxication, which were very plentifully supplied at Fort Washington, and used to an excessive degree by the soldiery, to correct the excessive use of which the most rigid attention to discipline was found incompetent.

Mr. Hodgdon was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the 4th of June, he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived the tenth of the same month. No sufficient causes have appeared to the committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the army appears to have been essentially necessary previously to that time; the duties of the commander in chief were much increased in consequence of the absence of the Quartermaster General, and after a continued expectation of his arrival at Fort Washington, for more than six weeks, the commander in chief gave him express orders, by letter, to repair to camp without delay.

The receipt of the letter is acknowledged, but the orders contained therein were neither answered nor obeyed, and his arrival at camp was not until the tenth of September. The commander in chief, until that time, in addition to the duties of his office, discharged those of the Quartermaster General, and the military stores furnished by that department were so deficient, from mismanagement and neglect, that many things essential to the movements of the army were either wholly made or repaired at Fort Washington, and even the tools for the artificers to work with: the Quartermaster particularly informed the commander in chief that two complete travelling forges were sent forward, and, upon examination, both of them were found to be without an anvil; many other things equally necessary were either wholly omitted, or unfit for their intended use. There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms at Fort Washington the first of June, and most of those totally out of repair. The commander in chief appears to have been correct and attentive in all his communications with the Secretary of War, and to have discharged the various duties which devolved upon him with ability, activity, and zeal.

The army moved from Ludlow's station on the seventeenth day of September, and arrived at the place where Fort Hamilton is now erected, on the — day of —; they employed about fifteen days building that fort, and then proceeded in their march to the place where Fort Jefferson is now erected, forty-four miles distant from Fort Hamilton, where they arrived on the twelfth day of October, and commenced their march from that place on the 24th of the same month; that the army at this time consisted of about 1700 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; at this time the army had not more than three days' supply of flour, and were sometimes at one fourth, and sometimes at one half, allowance of that article, the deficiencies of which allowance were made up by increasing the quantity of beef, with which they were plentifully supplied. The army was delayed five or six days, on the march from Fort Jefferson, for the want of provisions, and the season was so far advanced that sufficient green forage for the horses could not be procured, from which circumstance many of the horses were totally lost, and others rendered unfit for service.

The orders to the commander in chief to proceed with the expedition were express and unequivocal, so much so as, in the opinion of the committee, to preclude the commander in chief from exercising any discretion relatively to that object.

On the 31st of October, about sixty of the Kentucky militia deserted in a body, and the first regiment, consisting of about three hundred effective men, was detached with a view to cover a convoy of provisions which was expected, and which it was supposed was in danger from the deserted militia, and to prevent farther desertions.

On the third of November, after detaching the first regiment, the army consisted of about fourteen hundred effective men, and on the morning of the fourth, about half an hour before sunrise, a general attack was commenced, and in a few minutes thereafter, nearly the whole army was surrounded by the enemy; the action continued about four hours, during which several charges were made by part of the army, which caused the enemy to give way, but produced no good effect; the attack was unexpected, the troops having been just dismissed from the morning parade: it commenced upon the militia who were in advance of the main army, and who fled through the main army, without firing a gun; this circumstance threw the troops into some disorder, which, it appears, they never completely recovered during the action; the fire of the army was constant, but not well directed, and it appears that a part of the troops behaved as well as could be expected from their state of discipline, and the manner and suddenness of the attack; the commander in chief appears to have been cool and deliberate in the whole of the action, and the officers in general active and intrepid; the whole order of march, as far as the committee are capable of expressing an opinion, appears to have been judicious, and the ground for action well chosen; the retreat was disorderly in the extreme; after it commenced no orders were obeyed, if any were given, the men having lost all regard to discipline or control; all the precautions appear to have been taken for the safety and comfort of the wounded, which the circumstances of the case would admit of.

The committee have had no competent evidence before them to ascertain the number of the enemy in action; there were various conjectures as to the number from different persons, from five hundred the lowest, to one thousand or twelve hundred the highest.

Mr. Barton, a witness examined by the committee, conversed with a chief at Niagara, who was in the action, and was by him informed, that the number of the enemy in action was one thousand and forty, and that six hundred more had convened, but were engaging in hunting at the time of the action. He was also informed that the enemy had not collected in any considerable numbers, until a few days before the action. This information appears to be corroborated by some other circumstances, sufficient to induce a belief of the fact in the committee.

The contractors for supplies, agreeably to the terms of contract, were to furnish horses, &c. for the transportation of the supplies; in this condition of the contract there was a total failure, which compelled the commander in chief to direct between six and seven hundred horses to be purchased by Israel Ludlow, one of the contractor's agents, to draw bills on Mr. Duer, the acting contractor for payment, which bills were endorsed by the commander in chief, to the amount of about seventeen thousand dollars, were protested by the contractor, and paid at the treasury; the persons employed by the agents of the contractor to drive the horses, appear to have been totally unacquainted with that business, and from the want of bells, hobbles, and other necessaries of that kind, as well as from other gross mismanagement, many of the horses were lost, and others rendered unfit for service; from which causes there were not packhorses sufficient to transport the necessary quantity of flour from Fort Washington for the use of the army on their march; this circumstance retarded the execution of the expedition.

The officers, agreeably to the terms of contract, had an election of drawing the whole of the rations, to which their rank entitled them, or of receiving the contract price of them in cash; the contractor's agents, not being furnished with money for this purpose, gave rise to a general order, by which the officer was directed to receive a certificate from the contractor's agent, called a due bill, of one of which bills the following is a copy: "Due Major H. Gaither, one hundred and seventy-three complete rations on the route to Miami village, as appears by Mr. Wilson's certificate."

FORT WASHINGTON, November 27th, 1791.

MATT. EARNEST, for WM. DUER.

This due bill issued upon the officers signing some acknowledgment of satisfaction for his whole retained rations, which acknowledgment of satisfaction forms a voucher for settlement to the contractor, with the treasury department; and the officer is refused payment for these due bills at the pay-office. All casualties, by which these evidences of debt become lost or destroyed, are the gain of the contractor, and the loss of the officer.

It is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, though not with positive certainty, that a sufficient sum will be found due from the treasury to the contractors, upon a final settlement, to cover all these debts to the officers; the general order, which had the operation before stated, continued in force about five or six weeks, and was abolished about the 19th of October. The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments, to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service, and bearing endorsements, that some advancements had been made to them in account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations, the real sums due on the notes were various, from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for one dollar, or one gallon of whiskey; the moneys for the pay of the levies did not leave Philadelphia till the 4th of December, nor arrive at Fort Washington till the 3d of January, 1792, some time after the last enlisted levies were known to be entitled to their discharges; two reasons have been assigned by the Secretary of War for this delay of payment, the one, because there was no regular paymaster to the army, and the difficulties of transmitting moneys to the army at so great a distance, in consequence of the want of such an officer; the other, because it was supposed the army would be, at that time at the Miami village, so far advanced in the wilderness, as not to admit of the practicability of discharging the levies, the total defeat of the army not having been previously counted upon.

The clothing for the levies appears to have been of a very inferior quality, particularly coats, hats, and shoes, the last of which, in many cases, lasted not more than four days, and better clothing was furnished them upon their enlisting into the regular service, which was for a time countenanced by the commander in chief.

Various modes appear to have been pursued by the officers in enlisting the levies, which occasioned great uneasiness and some confusion; a considerable part of the Virginia battalion was so enlisted, that the terms of their enlistments appear to have expired the first of November; the orders to the recruiting officers appear not to have been sufficiently explicit upon this point, whether the terms of enlistment were to commence at the time of enlistment, or at the arrival at a place of rendezvous. The militia appear to have been composed principally of substitutes, and totally ungovernable, and regardless of military duty or subordination. It appears that the commander in chief had it in contemplation to commence the expedition at least one month earlier than it was commenced, with the force he then had, which was not very different from the real force in action; but was prevented for the want of the quartermaster and contractor, and in consequence of the extreme deficiencies and derangements of the business of those departments, the person sent forward by the Quartermaster being totally incompetent for the business, and the contractor's agents not being sufficiently supplied with money to enable them to execute their duties.

It appears to the committee, that, in the wilderness, where vegetables are not to be had, and the duties of the soldier uncommonly hard, the rations allowed by law, if completely supplied, are insufficient. This circumstance, with others, produced discontent and desertion among the soldiers.

It appears to the committee, that there were appropriated for the use of the War Department, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, the sum of six hundred and fifty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty-one dollars and sixty-one cents, and that there have been advanced by the treasury to the War Department, upon that appropriation, five hundred and seventy-five thousand nine hundred and six dollars and fifty-seven cents, to wit:

And that the treasury has always been in readiness to make the requisite advances upon the request of the Secretary of War. It does not appear to the committee, in what manner, and to what amount, these advancements have been disbursed, the accounts not having been yet settled at the treasury; nor was it possible, from the nature of the case, that they could, at this time, have received any conclusive or satisfactory information on that point.

From the foregoing state of facts, the committee suggest the following as the principal causes, in their opinion, of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

The delay in furnishing the materials and estimates for, and in passing the act for the protection of the frontiers; the time, after the passing of which, was hardly sufficient to complete and discipline an army for such an expedition, during the summer months of the same year.

The delays consequent upon the gross and various mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and contractors' departments; the lateness of the season at which the expedition was undertaken, the green forage having been previously destroyed by the frost, so that a sufficiency of subsistence for the horses necessary for the army could not be procured.

The want of discipline and experience in the troops.

The committee conceive it but justice to the commander in chief, to say, that, in their opinion, the failure of the late expedition can, in no respect, be imputed to his conduct, either at any time before or during the action; but that as his conduct in all the preparatory arrangements was marked with peculiar ability and zeal, so his conduct during the action furnished strong testimonies of his coolness and intrepidity.

The committee suggest, as reasons for leaving the numbers of troops, at particular periods, and the dates of some facts blank, the want of sufficient time to complete the report with minuteness, and, in some instances, the want of necessary evidence.

The said report being read,

Resolved, That this House will, early in the next session, proceed to take the same into consideration.

ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 14, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 1st November, 1792.

SIR:

After the close of the late session of Congress, I saw, with much concern, the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, of the 8th of May, 1792, which, having been presented to the House, in the last moments of its session, was ordered to be printed, and has since circulated in the public newspapers throughout the United States, containing suggestions, most of them founded upon ex parte investigation, which have been understood in a sense very injurious to my reputation.

Learning that the present day was appointed for taking into consideration the above mentioned report, I have waited, with anxious expectation, for some act of the House enabling me to attend the progress of the examination upon which they are about to enter, for the purpose of furnishing such information and explanations as might conduce to a right understanding of facts, in which I am so materially implicated. The failure of a proposition which, I am informed, was made to the House, with that view, has added to my solicitude and regret. Thus situated, I feel myself called upon to ask of the justice of the House, that some mode may be devised, by which it will be put into my power to be present, during the course of the intended inquiry, as well to hear the evidence on which the several allegations contained in the report are founded, as to offer the information and explanations to which I have alluded. To this step I am impelled by a persuasion that an accurate and satisfactory investigation cannot otherwise be had, with equal advantage, if at all. And my entire reliance upon the equity and impartiality of the House will not permit a doubt to exist, on my part, that such an investigation will be exclusively the object of their desire and pursuit.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States.

[2d SESSION.]

ESTIMATES FOR THE YEAR 1793.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 12, 1792.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 11, 1792.

SIR:

The President of the United States has directed me to submit to the House of Representatives, in pursuance of their resolve of the 4th instant, the enclosed papers containing certain materials whereon the estimate of the contingencies of the War Department, for the year 1793, has been founded; and, also, the explanation of certain heads of articles in the general estimate, called "conjectural."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the Honorable House of Representatives of the United States.

Of the contingencies of the War Department, for the year 1793.

In estimating the expenses of any given corps of troops, in a stationary situation, or upon a peace establishment, every probable demand may be foreseen, specified, and calculated. But, in estimating the expenses of an army, in the time of war, designed for offensive operations, the case is materially otherwise. For, after all the stated and probable expenses are estimated, there ought to be an allowance either to make up for short estimates of the several heads of supplies, or to serve as a fund to defray moderate losses by casualties.

* See Nos. 5 and 9.

All active armies are liable to the loss of provisions, the means of transportation, ammunition, clothing, &c., by numerous accidents attending on a state of war. But, in the case contemplated in the estimates, the chance of such accidents is greatly increased by the subtlety and activity of the enemy, and our ignorance of the wilderness in which the troops may operate.

It has generally been considered as wise to appropriate a sum for casualties, to be applied to the public service in case of necessity. If no such case occurs, no expenditure will take place, and, of course, the money will remain in the treasury. But, if no contingent fund be appropriated, the operations of an army may be arrested at a critical moment, and the army itself lost, or the public service greatly injured, for the want of means which might be acquired, if authority and provision existed for the purpose.

But futurity being inscrutable to the limited faculties for man, he is unable to ascertain the form or value of demands which have not, and which never may have, any existence.

All that can possibly be done, in the present case, is to exhibit the expenses of the late campaigns, and thence to infer the sum which may be judged proper to appropriate for the contingencies of the future, the strength and time of service of the relative armies being duly considered.

It will appear, by paper No. 1, that the claims for allowance, and the accounts actually settled, at the treasury, for the loss of horses, arms, &c. in the expedition under General Harmar, amount to seventeen thousand eight hundred and sixty-four dollars two cents, for which sum an appropriation was contemplated, by the act of the 11th day of February, 1791, embracing one hundred thousand dollars, for the said expedition.

The estimates presented for the services of 1791 were embraced by two appropriations, the first of the 11th day of February, 1791, for fifteen thousand three hundred and six dollars, including the sum of ten thousand three hundred and six dollars, for the Quartermaster's department.

The other, of the 3d day of March, 1791, for twenty-five thousand dollars, amounting, in all, for the said year, to forty thousand three hundred and six dollars.

The stores and other property lost in the defeat of the 4th of November, 1791, as stated in the paper No. 2, amount to thirty-two thousand eight hundred and ten dollars and seventy-five cents.

In addition to these losses, it appears, by paper No. 3, that the contractors have a claim at the treasury for provisions and horses, amounting to fifty-four thousand six hundred and thirteen dollars and thirty-five cents, of which, perhaps, the sum of ten thousand dollars may be estimated for contingencies, the articles having fallen into the hands of the enemy. Whether this sum will exceed, or fall short of, the allowances which shall be made, will depend upon the proofs which shall be produced at the treasury.

The other contingent expenses, for the year 1791, are contained in paper No. 4, amounting to nine thousand six hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty cents.

The total expenditures made, and allowances claimed, under the head of contingencies, for the year 1791, will probably amount to fifty-two thousand four hundred and thirty-one dollars ninety-five cents.

The estimates for the services of the year 1792 also specified two sums for the contingencies of the War Department. The first, of twenty thousand dollars, was authorized by the act which passed the 23d day of December, 1791, entitled "An act for making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1792."

The other sum of thirty thousand dollars was authorized by the act which passed the 2d day of May, 1792, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," both sums amounting to fifty thousand dollars.

The expenses already under this head are contained in paper No. 5, amounting to ten thousand two hundred and twenty-nine dollars nine cents.

It is to be observed, that the fund appropriated to the Indian department having been exhausted by goods given, and payments made, to the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and also to the Six Nations, that, in addition to the above sum, expended in the year 1792, as contingencies, twenty-four thousand seven hundred and seven dollars and ninety-eight cents has been applied to the Indian department.

The expenses of the Indian department are, at this critical period, as difficult to be previously calculated as those of the army, excepting the stipulated sums to the Creeks, Cherokees, and Six Nations, and the agents employed to the several tribes. Besides the said expenditures, the contractors of the present year lost, about the 5th of October last, one hundred horses, said to be captured by the Indians. If they prove this they will be entitled to an allowance by the terms of their contract.

Hence it will appear, that the sum of fifty thousand dollars, requested to be appropriated for the year 1793, is not inordinate.

For the sums which shall be expended vouchers will be required, in the usual manner of other accounts, excepting, always, the sums which may be expended, by the commanding general, for secret services, in which it would be prejudicial to the public interests to disclose names. But this sum is not large, and his reputation stands pledged to the public for its just appropriation.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

No. 8.

[2d SESSION.]

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY IN 1792.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR, DECEMBER 27, 1792.

The President of the United States, by virtue of the powers vested in him by law, hereby establishes the following organization of the troops of the United States:

The commissioned officers hereinafter designated, together with the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by law, amounting to 5,120, are to be denominated—

THE LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES, which is to be divided into four sub-legions.

THE LEGIONARY STAFF.

One Major General, or Legionary General,
Two Aids-de-camp,
One Adjutant and Inspector,
One Major Commandant of Cavalry,
One Major Commandant of Artillery,

One Quartermaster,
One Deputy Quartermaster,
One Surgeon,
One Chaplain.

John Cochran securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract; that, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; that, by letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the twenty-fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments.³

From documents received by the committee, since their last appointment, it appears, that the copy of the before mentioned transfer was not lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, until the seventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; at which time it was received by the Secretary of the Treasury, under cover of a letter from William Duer, informing him of the circumstance of the said transfer, and making requisitions for certain advances of money; that the Secretary of the Treasury, by letter in reply of the same date, agrees to make the advances required to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

It appears that all the warrants issued from the Treasury, for the purposes of this contract, were issued to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the committee with the written opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, and several other lawyers of eminence, all of whom concur in opinion, that the securities to the bond, originally given by Theodosius Fowler, for the execution of this contract, are now responsible for all damages consequent upon any breach of that contract.

The Secretary of War, who alone appears to have been the agent, on the part of the United States, in all things relating to the execution of the contract has always corresponded with William Duer as the contractor, and his correspondence commences at a date prior to that of the copy of the contract lodged at the treasury.

The original report proceeds:—

“That, on the sixth of March, one thousand seven and ninety-one, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary of War, for supplying the troops with provisions until their arrival at Fort Pitt, and at Fort Pitt. A bond was, at the same time, entered into by the said William Duer for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatsoever.”

It appears, by a re-examination of the documents formerly before the committee, that the date and terms of the last mentioned contract were misrepresented; the date being the twenty-sixth, instead of the sixth, of April, and the terms of the contract being to furnish provisions for the troops until their arrival at Fort Pitt, but not during their continuance at that place. The first of these mistakes appears to have been merely casual; the second appears to have arisen from paying greater attention to the manner in which the contract was really executed, than to the terms of the contract itself; it having been conceived, by the committee, that Colonel Neville, the agent for supplying the troops during their continuance at Fort Pitt, acted under the last mentioned contract. This circumstance is rendered the less material, from the consideration that, according to the plan of the campaign, no delay of the troops at Fort Pitt was counted upon. The statement is otherwise correct.

The Secretary of War, in his communication, states, that it was not the custom of the office to require other security than that of the contractor, for the due execution of contracts of small amount; and it appears, by a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, written since the former report, that the Secretary of War consulted with him upon the occasion alluded to, and that he agreed in opinion, that farther security was not necessary.

It is stated in the original report, after speaking of one of the contractor's agents, that

“It appears by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on eighth of May, and it appears that, on the 23d of March, there was advanced to William Duer, on the last mentioned contract, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars.”

Upon re-examining the letters of John Kean, it appears that he had received the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, and no more, before the aforesaid eighth day of May, which was before overlooked by the committee. And it appears, from documents received by the committee since their report, that the sum of fifteen thousand dollars was not advanced to William Duer, on account of the last mentioned contract, on the 23d of March. The committee were led into this mistake, by a document received from the Treasurer, representing the fact as stated in the original report, which document is still before the committee. The true state of this transaction, as recently stated, appears to be as follows:

A warrant issued in favor of Joseph Howell, on the twenty-third of March, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, for the use of the War Department generally, and not for William Duer, as stated in the account rendered by the Treasurer: of which sum, were advanced to William Duer, on the twenty-sixth of March, four thousand dollars; on the eighth day of May following, were paid to James Smith, contracting agent for William Duer, one thousand dollars; and between the twenty-first of May and the twenty-third of July, were paid to John Kean, another agent for William Duer, four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; making the whole sum advanced on the last mentioned contract, five thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents. The residue of the fifteen thousand dollars is suggested to have been applied to the use of the War Department generally.

The original report states, that

“It appears from the correspondence of General Butler, from the ninth of May to the ninth of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects, in the Quartermaster's and military stores' departments, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp kettles, cartridge boxes, packsaddles, &c. all of which articles were deficient in quantity, and bad in quality. The packsaddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use.”

Mr. Hodgdon has produced to the Committee a number of ex-parte affidavits and certificates, to prove, that these several articles were furnished in sufficient quantities, and of good quality. Most of these affidavits, however, were made by the manufacturers of the respective articles, or persons in the employment of Mr. Hodgdon, and generally written in a different hand writing from that of the subscribing deponents; and most of the certificates, by persons unknown to the committee. But the testimony formerly taken by the committee, and the corroboration of it by the evidence of respectable and disinterested persons, lately taken by the committee, in presence of Mr. Hodgdon, appears abundantly sufficient to justify the statement of facts contained in the original report. With respect to the packsaddles, however, it is necessary to remark, that some qualification of the expression used in the original report would be proper. They appear to have been made of different sizes: those of the largest size are proved to have been wholly unfit for use, the horses used for packhorses being generally small. Some of the smaller packsaddles, however, appear to have been used in the campaign, and to have answered the intended purpose better than was at first expected.

It is stated in the original report, that

“The arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use, which circumstance rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt.”

The committee are led to conclude, from authentic information recently received, that the complaint of the arms intended for the regular troops and levies is unfounded; some of the arms appear to have been damaged, after they were put into the hands of the troops, from their inexperience or carelessness, though delivered to them in good order.

The committee were induced to make the unqualified statement contained in the original report, from the unqualified manner in which this subject is spoken of by some of the witnesses, formerly examined by the committee;

they not having stated, with sufficient precision, the causes of the arms being out of repair, nor specifying the probable number requiring repairs.

The original report proceeds with the following expression:

“It appears, that a great proportion of the powder, supplied for the use of the army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson, at Fort Pitt, with a howitzer, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder.”

The committee are satisfied, from experiments made since the original report by Captain Ford, at Fort Washington, upon request of the Secretary of War, and by samples of the powder from thence, actually furnished the committee, that the powder was originally of good quality; but that a certain quantity of it was damaged by exposure to the air and moisture after being issued to the troops. And it appears to have been powder of this description, upon which experiments were made by some of the officers in the expedition, which produced unfavorable impressions as to the quality of the powder in general; for it is certain, a belief was currently entertained amongst the officers, that the powder in general was not of good quality. The insufficiency of the powder, after the army took the field, is accounted for from the bad quality of the tents. It is in testimony to the committee, that great quantities of the fixed ammunition were actually rendered useless from that cause.

It is stated in the original report, that “Mr. Hodgson was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the 4th of June, he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived on the 10th of the same month. No sufficient causes have appeared to the committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the army appeared to have been essentially necessary previously to that time.”

In this statement, the duration of Mr. Hodgson's stay at Fort Pitt was casually omitted, which appears to have been from the tenth of June till the twenty-sixth of August. The insertion of this fact will sufficiently explain the sense of the committee, in the inference respecting the time, in which the presence of the Quartermaster General was necessary at the army.

It is stated in the original report, that

“There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms, at Fort Washington, on the first of June, and most of those totally out of repair.”

These arms, the precise number of which appears not to be accurately ascertained, are admitted, by the Secretary of War, to have been at Fort Washington, in the situation described, but he suggests, that they were old and useless arms, which had been collected at that place, and were not counted upon as any part of the supply of arms for the expedition. It appears, that the regular troops and levies were completely supplied with arms, without recurrence to this stock; but a number of them was repaired, by orders of the commander in chief of the expedition, with a view, as he suggests, to arm the militia from Kentucky, who, it was expected, would arrive either insufficiently armed, or not armed at all: and he did not conceive the arrangements made by the War Department competent to arming the militia, together with the other troops.

“The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without farther pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service, and bearing endorsements, that some advances had been made to them on account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations, the real sums due on the notes were various, from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for one dollar, or one gallon of whiskey; the moneys for the pay of the levies did not leave Philadelphia, till the fourth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, nor arrived at Fort Washington till the third of January one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, some time after the last enlisted levies are known to have been entitled to their discharges.”

In addition to the reasons contained in the original report, respecting the discharging of the levies, without their stipulated pay, which are admitted by the Secretary of War to have been justly stated, he has, in his late communication suggested to the committee, that, at the time of the discharge of the levies, there was actually in the hands of the Quartermaster General the sum of sixteen thousand two hundred ninety-two dollars and seventy cents, which were subject to be applied to any object, agreeably to the discretion of the commander in chief of the expedition, and might have been applied, if he thought proper, to the payment of the discharged levies, and would have been sufficient for two months' pay to the officers, and four months' pay to the privates. This sum is admitted by the Quartermaster General to have been in his hands at the time of the discharge of the levies, and would have been applied to their pay, if orders had been given by the commander in chief of the expedition for that purpose. But no such orders ever were received by him. The Secretary of War infers, from these circumstances, that no censurability should be imputed to the War Department for not having paid implicit attention to this subject.

The circumstances respecting this transaction have been attentively examined by the committee, and appear to them to be the following:—The Quartermaster General, upon his leaving Philadelphia, was furnished with the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the use of that Department. He was afterwards furnished with two other sums, to wit, the sum of seventeen thousand eight hundred and forty four dollars and fifty cents, on the twenty-third day of July, and the sum of two thousand two hundred and twenty four dollars and sixty cents, on the seventh day of July, making together the sum of twenty thousand and sixty nine dollars and ten cents. It appears, by letter from the Secretary of War, to the commander in chief of the expedition, that five thousand dollars of this sum were to be applied to the pay of the regular troops, if the commander in chief should deem that a proper application of the money, which, however, was not done. The remaining part of this money was intended to form a kind of military chest, to answer contingent expenses; subject, however, to the control of the commander in chief. It appears that the Quartermaster General, in addition to these supplies of cash, was authorized to draw bills on the Secretary of War, with this restriction—that the commander in chief should approve of all drafts, and certify the necessity or propriety of making them. The Quartermaster General commenced his drafts, at Fort Pitt, previously to his arrival at head quarters, to the amount of two thousand six hundred dollars, and continued them after his arrival; but it does not appear that those drafts were certified, or sanctioned, by the commander in chief: all which drafts were honored by the Secretary of War.

It is suggested by the commander in chief, that he never considered the money, before mentioned, appropriated to the pay of the levies, upon their discharges, nor that it was ever intended to be applied to that object. He further suggests a want of knowledge of the money, said to be on hand, at the time of the discharges of the levies, although he admits, that the Quartermaster General, shortly after his arrival at head quarters, tendered him a statement of the cash on hand, which he returned, without examination, observing, that he had already received sufficient information relatively thereto, from the Secretary of War; that he was informed of the amount of moneys originally received by the Quartermaster General, and conceived that he could form some idea of the balance on hand, from the sums disbursed in consequence of warrants drawn by him, which, he expected, were paid from that fund; that his want of information, as to the real balance, arose from the circumstance of the bills drawn by the Quartermaster General without his knowledge, or the requisite certificate from him, which bills operated as a relief to that fund, for their amount. The commander in chief of the expedition further suggested, to the committee, in presence of the Quartermaster General, that, upon making drafts upon the fund before alluded to, he usually inquired of the Quartermaster General, whether it was sufficient for the purpose of answering the draft, and upon repeating this inquiry, just before the discharge of the levies, he received for answer, “that the chest was very low.” This statement was acquiesced in, or, at least, not denied by the Quartermaster General.

The Quartermaster General has furnished the committee with a statement of his account, by which, it appears, that he had on hand, on the fifth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, cash to the amount of fifteen thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars and forty-two cents, and two thirds of a cent, which, he suggests, have been since applied to the use of his department. This balance is denied to have been on hand, by the commander in chief, at that time; and he has furnished a statement of disbursements from the original fund, which leaves the amount of the balance, at the time of the discharge of the levies, of one thousand four hundred eighty-three dollars eighty-six cents, exclusive of five thousand dollars appropriated to the pay of the old troops.

The commander in chief further suggests, that there was no paymaster to the army, nor any person authorized to settle the accounts of the soldiers, and ascertain the real balances due to them, until the arrival of Mr. Swann, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; and infers, that he had no authority to direct a settlement and order pay to the soldiers, until he was informed of the arrangements made at the War Office, relatively to that object. This suggestion is strongly confirmed by a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the commander in chief, and forwarded by Mr. Swann, which designates Mr. Swann as paymaster, and contains instructions relatively to the terms of settling the accounts of the soldiery. The same letter serves to show, that the twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and ten cents, put into the possession of the Quartermaster General, were not conclusively destined for the pay of the levies, nor so considered by the Secretary of War, because it is asserted in the letter, that Mr. Swann is furnished with a sum of money sufficient for the whole pay of the levies, without making any deduction in consequence of the moneys furnished the Quartermaster General.

It is asserted by the Secretary of War, in his communication to the committee, that the time of the service of the levies did not expire until after the arrival of Mr. Swann at Fort Washington, particularly Gaither's and Rhea's battalions, the term of their enlistments having been to serve six months after their arrival at Fort Washington; which was deemed the place of rendezvous. The time which had elapsed from the period of enlistment, to their arrival at Fort Washington, or the evident impropriety of annexing such a condition to the enlistments, caused the condition itself to be dispensed with, and those levies were actually discharged shortly after the twelfth of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, in consequence of having served six months, which is the extent of the service authorized by law, and actually received certificates, at that time, of having performed six months' service.

Upon a re-examination of the residue of the original report, and the evidence now before the committee, they are satisfied with the same, and find no material alterations or corrections necessary.

A regard for candor has induced the committee to adopt this mode of reporting, because the original report is thereby preserved, mistakes existing in the same, and which are now corrected, and the causes of those mistakes rendered obvious, and the whole subject presented to view upon the fairest terms, in the opinion of the committee, to all persons in any degree concerned therein.

RETURN OF ORDNANCE, ARMS, AND MILITARY STORES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR, DECEMBER 16, 1793.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 14th, 1793.

IR:

I have the honor to submit a return of the ordnance, arms, and military stores, in possession of the United States.

It resulted from the casual circumstances of the late war, that these stores were accumulated principally at the following points, viz: New London, in Virginia; Philadelphia; West Point, on Hudson River; and Springfield, on Connecticut River; all of which, perhaps, excepting Springfield, are improper places for permanent magazines.

The important characteristics for magazines and arsenals seem to be perfect security against enemies, internal and external, blended with an easy access by water. The expense of land transportation of heavy articles, for a series of years, compared with that by water, renders the latter quality indispensable for a magazine.

The situation of New London, being destitute of water communication with the ocean, is not a proper place for a permanent magazine, and it would seem therefore necessary that some other position should be sought on James River, more suitable for the erection of proper buildings.

It may be questionable whether a populous city is a proper place for the repository of large quantities of military stores, on account of the accidents to which such places are liable by fire and other causes. Hence it is intended that a part of the stores, now deposited in Philadelphia, shall be removed to some safe position higher up the Delaware.

West Point, on Hudson River, although a precious link in the chain which binds the States together, has, on account of the well known navigation of that river, and the easy access from the ocean, been considered as an improper place for an extensive magazine. For this reason part of the surplus stores have been removed temporarily to Albany.

During the late war a number of valuable brick buildings were erected at Carlisle, in Pennsylvania, as well for the reception of stores, as to accommodate a number of workmen in the Ordnance Department; but these buildings were not much used after the apprehensions of invasion subsided, owing to the expense and delay occasioned by the land transportation. The same causes still prevent their use in any considerable degree.

The situation of the United States would seem to require, that three capital magazines should be established permanently, one for the southern, one for the middle, and one for the eastern States, with such subdivisions as may be deemed indispensable for general use.

It would also seem to be a dictate of sound national policy, that the United States should always possess one hundred thousand arms placed in their respective arsenals, and that the battering and field artillery and ammunition should be in ample proportion.

It is presumed that all the cannon, arms, and ammunition required by the United States, might be fabricated among ourselves. It is possible the expense may be greater than if the articles were imported, but this circumstance is not of such moment as to be compared with the solid advantages which would result from extending and perfecting the means upon which our safety may ultimately depend.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

3d CONGRESS.]

No. 11.

[1st SESSION.

PURVEYOR OF PUBLIC SUPPLIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 7, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives :

Experience has shown that it would be useful to have an officer particularly charged, under the direction of the Department of War, with the duties of receiving, safe keeping, and distributing the public supplies, in all cases in which the laws and the course of service do not devolve them upon other officers, and also with that of superintending, in all cases, the issues in detail of supplies, with power, for that purpose, to bring to account all persons entrusted to make such issues, in relation thereto. An establishment of this nature, by securing a regular and punctual accountability for the issues of public supplies, would be a great guard against abuse, would tend to ensure their due application, and to give public satisfaction on that point.

I therefore recommend to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of an establishment of this nature, under such regulations as shall appear to them advisable.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 7, 1794.

3d CONGRESS.]

No. 12.

[1st SESSION.

PURVEYOR OF PUBLIC SUPPLIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1794.

The select committee, to whom was referred the message received from the President of the United States on the 7th January last, relative to the appointment of an officer for receiving, safe keeping, and distributing the public supplies, made the following report:

That an officer, similar to that contemplated by the President's message, existed during the late war.

That the effects of order and accountability in the department of military stores were then of such eminent utility as induce a hope in your committee, that similar benefits will result from such an establishment at this time. It is of great importance, that the deposits of ordnance and military stores should be annually visited and inspected; and that the quality, as well as the quantity, of such stores should exactly correspond with the returns transmitted to the War Office. This object appears the more desirable, if not indispensable, in the present distributed state of the public arsenals, which extend from Springfield, in Connecticut, to New London, in Virginia, and which are now superintended by persons of little or no accountability.

With the duties of receiving and safe keeping the public supplies, it is also of importance that particular attention should be paid to the issues, in detail, of such supplies; and that the officer superintending the same should be vested with powers, not only that the application of such supplies is consonant to the object Government had in view, but to call to an account all persons entrusted to make such issues, and to cause a settlement to be thereof made.

From which considerations, your committee are of opinion, that it is expedient such an establishment should be made; and thereupon submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill providing for the compensation which will be required in the establishment of an office, under the Department of War, for the receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing of military stores and supplies.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1794.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS made the following report:

The committee directed to report on such of the ports and harbors of the United States as require to be put in a state of defence, with an estimate of the expense thereof, report, as their opinion, that the following ports and harbors ought to be put in a state of defence, to wit:

Portland, Maine,
 Portsmouth, New Hampshire,
 Cape Anne,
 Salem,
 Marblehead, } Massachusetts,
 Boston,
 Newport, Rhode Island,
 New London,
 9 m

New York,
 Philadelphia,
 Baltimore,
 Norfolk,
 Wilmington, North Carolina,
 Ocracoke Inlet,
 Charleston, South Carolina,
 Savannah, Georgia.

That, in their opinion, the fortifications ought to be of a nature to defend the several ports and harbors against surprise by naval armaments; and that the parapets of the batteries and redoubts should be formed of earth, where circumstances will admit.

That the several places, to be fortified, be garrisoned by troops in the pay of the United States.

The estimates, submitted herewith, will show the expense as well of erecting the fortifications, as for providing the cannon and military stores, and the annual expense of supporting the troops. The number of troops to be employed, in each port, is likewise specified.

From these estimates it appears that the sums necessary to erect the fortifications, amount to - $76,053 52]

That it will be necessary to provide two hundred cannon, which, together with their carriages,	96,645 00
&c. amount to	-
Making, together -	- $172,698 52

And that the annual expenses of the troops, necessary to garrison the several fortifications, including pay, subsistence, &c. amount to $90,349 25

It may be proper for the committee to remark, that, in their opinion, it will be necessary, for the security of the United States, to provide the number of cannon above specified, even if the fortifications, before mentioned, should not be erected.

But, as the precise number of those which are supposed may be furnished by the respective States are uncertain, it would seem most prudent to have cast 200 heavy pieces, of the caliber 24 and 36 pounders.

An estimate of the expense of one hundred twenty-four pound cannon, each weighing 2 tons—200 tons at $80,	$16,000
100 of the caliber of cannon of 36 pounders, at 3 tons—300 tons, at $80,	24,000

If the several works should be garrisoned in ordinary by a part of the legion of the United States, now in service, the expense is already calculated in the general estimate of the War Department for the year 1794. But, in order to save references thereto, the expense of the number of troops proposed is here specified.

It will not escape notice, that the proposed troops are not artillery, but infantry. It is, however, supposed, that some of the artillery officers in service might be used on the present occasion, and that part of the infantry officers might be chosen for the purpose, who would soon acquire a tolerable degree of knowledge in the use of cannon.

Estimate of the expenses of the number of troops to be posted in the aforementioned works, as their ordinary protection, for twelve months.

ARSENALS AND ARMORIES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 5, 1794.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's speech of the third of December last, as relates to arms and military stores, magazines and arsenals, made the following report:

That, in addition to the arsenal at Springfield, there ought to be erected two other arsenals, with magazines and other necessary buildings, at such place as may be directed by the President of the United States, and so as to accommodate the Southern and Middle States.

That, in addition to the arms and military stores on hand, there ought to be provided,

7,000 muskets, with bayonets,
2,000 spare bayonets,
1,000 large horsemen's pistols,
100 tons of salt-petre, or 50 tons of powder,
200 tons of lead.

That there ought to be established a national armory for the purpose of making and repairing arms.

The committee submit, herewith, estimates of the expense of erecting two additional arsenals and magazines, amounting to, $59,000 00

Of the cost of the additional arms and military stores necessary to be provided, amounting to, 143,640 00

And of the annual expense of a national armory, from which may be expected 4,200 muskets, and bayonets annually, amounting to, 22,865 20

In conformity with the foregoing opinions and estimates, the committee beg leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to direct two arsenals and magazines to be erected, in proper situations, to accommodate the Southern and Middle States; and that a sum, not exceeding fifty-nine thousand dollars be provided for that purpose.

Resolved, That a national armory be erected; and that a superintendent, and two master armorers be appointed by the President of the United States, to superintend the same. That so many persons may, from time to time, be employed therein, as the Secretary for the Department of War may judge necessary; and that a sum not exceeding twenty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty-five dollars be provided for defraying the expense thereof.

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding one hundred and forty-three thousand six hundred and forty dollars, be provided for the purpose of purchasing an additional quantity of arms and ammunition.

No. 1.

Estimate of the expense of purchasing the following articles.

7,000 muskets, at 9 dollars each,		$63,000
2,000 bayonets, at 1 do.		2,000

Estimate for two sets of Arsenals and Magazines.

A brick building, three stories high, one hundred and seventy-five feet long, and forty-two feet wide, would contain twenty thousand muskets, artillery and carriages in proportion, together with all the light appendages thereof.
Such a building has been estimated, at the present rate of workmanship, to cost	$15,000
An arched brick magazine, capable of containing two thousand five hundred barrels of powder,	2,500
Brick barracks, and workshop for one hundred armorers, and barracks for the necessary guard,	10,000
Purchase of the necessary ground,	2,000
	29,500
	Dollars,

There is, at present, at Springfield, an excellent brick magazine, and a variety of wooden buildings, which, with repair, may serve the purpose of securing the public stores at that place, for several years.

If, therefore, two principal arsenals and magazines should be erected at present, besides subordinate ones, they might be sufficient. For the expenses of the latter, the sums contained in the general estimate of the War Department might be adequate.

Two sets of magazines and arsenals, workshops and barracks, each at 29,500 dollars, . . . $59,000

No. 3.

An estimate of the annual expense of the institution of a National Armory, of one superintendent and seventy workmen, and thirty boys.

One superintendent, at 60 dolls. per month,	720 00	Dolls. per ann.
Two master armorers, 40 . . . do.	960 00
Sixty-eight journeymen, 15 . . . do.	12,240 00
Thirty boys, as apprentices, clothing annually, at 20 dollars each	600 00
	14,520 00

RATIONS.

One superintendent, three rations per day	1,095
Two master armorers, two each,	1,460
Sixty-eight journeymen, one and half each,	37,230
Thirty boys, one and a half each	16,425
	56,210	at 12 cents.
Rent of workshops and barracks, estimated at	600 00
Barrack utensils, annually, for one hundred men and boys, beds, blankets, fuel, &c.	1,000 00
	22,865 20	Dollars

PRODUCE.

Muskets and bayonets which the above workmen may make monthly, 350, annually, 4,200, at 9 dolls. each	Dollars, 37,800
Deduct for materials on each, 2 dolls. 25 cts.	9,450
Hence it would appear, that the probable profit of the labour of the above mentioned number of men and boys, would amount annually to	5,484 80

Economy and experience may even increase the profit, especially where the proposed apprentices should be rendered expert workmen. But were there no profit at all, but a loss incurred, it is humbly conceived, an institution of this nature, by disseminating the knowledge of so valuable an art, would, in a just political view, amply compensate the expense.

Mr. COBB, from the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations are, in their opinion, necessary to the act, "more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," made the following report:

That they are impressed with the importance of a more energetic system for the establishment of an uniform militia than what is contemplated by the present existing law of the United States; but, in viewing this subject, as applied to the Constitution of the United States, and the powers therein expressly reserved to the different States, they have their doubts how far Congress can, consistent therewith, make any important alterations or amendments to the present law; and as the right of training the militia is constitutionally reserved to the States, if they can be impressed with the importance of exercising this power, and directing its operation, more especially to the light infantry and grenadier companies of each regiment, an efficient force may be thereby created, and equal to any that can probably be obtained by any additional law of the United States, made under the constitutional powers of Congress. Under this view of the subject, and until further experience shall be had under the existing law, the committee are of opinion that no amendment is necessary to the act for establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States.

INCREASING THE ARMY, AND CALLING INTO SERVICE 80,000 MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 27, 1794.

MR. SEDGWICK, from the committee to whom it was referred to report the means of rendering the force of the United States more efficient, made the following report:

That effectual measures ought to be adopted to complete the present military establishment of the United States, and that provision ought to be made that the same may be kept full.

That an additional corps of artillery, not to exceed eight hundred men, officers included, and also including one chief and four assistant engineers, ought to be raised, garrisoning the fortifications which are or may be erected for the defence of the sea coast.

That the President be authorized and empowered to call on the Executives of the several States, to take effectual measures, as soon as may be, to organize and hold in readiness to march, at a moment's warning, eighty thousand effective militia, (officers included,) to be apportioned to the States respectively, in proportion to the whole number of white inhabitants, that is to say:

UNITED STATES, November 25, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a statement of the troops in the service of the United States, which has been submitted to me by the Secretary of War. It will rest with Congress to consider and determine, whether further inducements shall be held out for entering into the military service of the United States, in order to complete the establishment authorized by law.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, November 24, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit to your view a statement of the non-commissioned officers and privates at present in the service of the United States, specifying the places where they are, and the periods which they have still to serve.

The force immediately under Major General Wayne is much lessened by the expiration of the services of his troops, and is inferior to the demand of existing circumstances. Unless, therefore, he be reinforced early in the ensuing spring, the advantages which he has gained in the course of the present year, which ought to be permanently secured, must be in danger of being relinquished.

The experiments which have recently been made to engage men for military service, on the present inducements, evince, decisively, that no expectation can be indulged of completing the numbers authorized by law without further encouragement.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 4, 1794.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the message of the President which respects the fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, made the following report:

That by the report of the Secretary at War, it appears, that in pursuance of the act of the last session, the fortifications of the different ports and harbors are in considerable forwardness, excepting only the port of Boston, and Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, suspended for reasons assigned by the Secretary, in his report.*

That contracts have been entered into for the ordnance necessary, and measures taken for progressing in the fortifications, as soon as the season will permit.

That from the necessity of enlarging the plan of defence in some instances, and the enhanced price of labor and materials, since the first estimate was made, a sum not less than 225,500 dollars, will be necessary to complete the plan of defence contemplated, admitting the fortifications to be constructed of timber and earth; and if executed with stone, to a much larger sum.

The committee, taking into view the circumstances connected with this subject, and having received the necessary information from the Secretary of War, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the necessary works for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States ought to be continued, and constructed of the most durable materials, so as best to answer the purposes of defence and permanency.

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding 500,000 dollars, (over and above the sums already appropriated) be appropriated for the purpose aforesaid; and that a sum, not exceeding 100,000 dollars per annum, be provided for the service aforesaid.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to give preference, in point of time, to the completion of such of the said fortifications as he may think advisable.

PURVEYOR OF PUBLIC SUPPLIES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 11, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you, for consideration, a representation made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of constituting an officer to be specially charged with the business of procuring certain public supplies.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 11, 1794.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1794.

The Secretary of the Treasury has the honor respectfully to make the following representation to the President of the United States, in order that he may determine on the expediency of laying the subject of it before Congress. The procuring of military supplies generally is, with great propriety, vested by law in the Department of the Treasury. That department, from situation, may be expected to feel a more habitual solicitude for economy than any other, and to possess more means of information respecting the best modes of obtaining supplies. It is, however, important that the particular arrangement should be such as to enable the department to execute the trust in the best manner. This branch of the public business forms a very considerable one of the public expenditure. Including supplies for the Navy, it is so extensive as, to be well executed, would occupy the whole time and attention of one person possessing the requisite qualifications. This, with the growth of the country, must be every year more and more the case. It cannot, therefore, be conducted in detail by the head of the department, or by any existing officer of it, now charged with other duties, without being less well executed than it ought to be, or interfering with other essential duties, or without a portion of both these inconveniences, to the material detriment of the public service. Experience has already verified the position.

It must then, of necessity, either be confided to a special agent employed by the head of the department, or to a new officer of the department, to be constituted by law, and to act under the direction and superintendance of that head. The last mode is preferable to the first, for obvious reasons.

Wherever an object of public business is likely to be permanent, it is more fit that it should be transacted by an officer of the Government, regularly constituted, than by the agent of a department specially entrusted. The officer can be placed, by law, under more effectual checks. In the present case that idea is particularly important. The person entrusted ought to be prohibited, under penalties, from all dealing on his own account in the objects of supply. The duration and emoluments of a mere agency being precarious, a well qualified man, disposed to make the necessary sacrifices of other pursuits, and to devote himself exclusively to the business, could with much greater difficulty, if at all, be found.

The compensation to such an officer ought, it is conceived, to weigh nothing as an objection. Independent of the equivalent expense arising from the necessity of employing and compensating an agent, it is morally certain that the close, constant, undivided attention, of a person charged exclusively with this object, and in condition, for that reason, to make the minute as well as extensive inquiries and investigations which are often requisite, would produce savings to the United States, with which the salary of the officer could bear no comparison. It is equally evident that it would contribute greatly to punctuality, despatch, and efficiency in procuring the supplies.

Respectfully submitted,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 11, 1794.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 10, 1794.

SIR:

In obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, I have the honor to submit to the House of Representatives, a statement of such difficulties and inconveniences as have occurred in the execution of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

The Secretary of War, in obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, respectfully submits the following statement of such difficulties and inconveniences as have occurred in the execution of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States."

That a difficulty of primary importance appears to oppose the execution of the first section of the before recited act. The militia are requested to arm and equip themselves, at their own expense; but there is no penalty to enforce the injunction of the law.

The subscriber is informed, that several States have passed auxiliary laws to the act of Congress. The laws of the following States, upon this subject, are in his possession, to wit: Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and North Carolina.

The penalties, by these, for non-equipment and armament, appear to be according to the following extracts:

MASSACHUSETTS—passed the 22d June, 1793.

“And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid—That every non-commissioned officer or private of the infantry, who shall neglect to keep himself armed and equipped, as aforesaid, or who shall, on a muster day, or at any other time of examination, be destitute of, or appear unprovided with, the arms and equipments herein directed, (except as before excepted,) shall pay a fine, not exceeding twenty shillings, in proportion to the articles of which he shall be deficient, at the discretion of the justice of the peace before whom trial shall be had. And all parents, masters, and guardians, shall furnish those of the said militia, who shall be under their care and command, with the arms and equipments, before mentioned, under the like penalties for any neglect. And whenever the select men, of any town, shall judge any inhabitant thereof, belonging to the militia, unable to arm and equip himself in manner as aforesaid, they shall, at the expense of the town, provide for, and furnish, such inhabitant, with the aforesaid arms and equipments, which shall remain the property of the town, at the expense of which they shall be provided. And if any soldier shall embezzle, or destroy, the arms and equipments with which he shall be furnished, he shall, upon conviction before some justice of the peace, be adjudged to replace the article or articles which shall by him be so embezzled, or destroyed, and to pay the cost from the process arising against him. And if he shall not perform the same, within fourteen days, after such adjudication, it shall be in the power of the select men, of the town to which he shall belong, to bind him out to service, or labor, for such term of time as shall, in the discretion of the said justice, be sufficient to procure a sum of money equal to the value of the article or articles so embezzled or destroyed, and pay cost arising as aforesaid.”

NEW JERSEY—passed June 5, 1793.

“And if any such militia-man shall appear, when called out to exercise or into service, without a musket or a rifle, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of three shillings and nine pence; and for want of every other of the aforesaid articles six pence. Each and every man so enrolled as aforesaid, and providing himself with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, required as aforesaid, shall hold the same exempted from all suits, distress, executions, or sales for debt, or the payment of taxes. Provided always, That whenever the mayors of any battalion shall judge any person, enrolled therein, unable to arm and equip himself, as aforesaid, such person shall not be subject to any fine for not arming; any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.”

PENNSYLVANIA—passed the 11th April, 1793.

“Provided always, That whenever the field-officers of any regiment shall judge any person enrolled therein unable to arm and equip himself as aforesaid, such person shall not be subject to any fine for not arming; any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.”

It does not appear that any specified penalty is imposed by this act on persons neglecting to arm and equip themselves.

MARYLAND—passed at November sessions, 1793.

“And any non-commissioned officer or matross in the artillery, and any non-commissioned officer or dragoon, who shall so refuse or neglect to attend on any of the said days, armed and accoutred as aforesaid, (except as before excepted,) shall forfeit a sum not exceeding two-thirds of a dollar per day; and all other non-commissioned officers and privates who shall refuse or neglect to attend, armed and accoutred as herein before directed, (except as before excepted,) shall forfeit and pay one cent per day, unless excused for appearing without arms and accoutrements, by the commanding officers of their respective companies for the day.”

“And every non-commissioned officer and private who shall fail to appear on the said occasions, shall forfeit for every such failure or neglect, ten shillings, or, if appearing, he be not armed and provided in manner as directed by this act, shall, for such deficiency, forfeit and pay five shillings. And if the officers of a company, or any two of them, after an examination upon oath, shall adjudge any person or persons, enrolled as aforesaid, to be incapable of providing and furnishing him or themselves with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements required by this act, they shall make report thereof to the next battalion court-martial, as the case may be, who may, if it should appear necessary, exempt such person or persons from the fines and forfeitures by this act imposed, until such arms and accoutrements shall be provided and delivered him or them by the court-martial, who shall take security for the safe keeping of such arms and accoutrements, to be returned when required.”

But it is certain that, were the penalties greedily enhanced, an insuperable difficulty would occur in obtaining the requisite number of arms in any reasonable period. The numbers comprehended in the act, from eighteen to forty-five years of age, inclusively, deducting the exempts and mariners, may be estimated probably at about four hundred and fifty thousand men. Of these, probably not one hundred thousand are armed as the act requires, although a greater number might be found of common and ordinary muskets, without bayonets. The deficiency cannot be supplied from Europe, under the present circumstances. The only solid resource to obtain a supply, is the establishment of manufactories within each state.

The deficiency of arms cannot be more forcibly exemplified than that, to arm the militia lately called into service, estimated at fifteen thousand, the number of ten thousand arms have been issued from the public arsenals. Loss and injury must be expected to arise upon the articles issued.

No adequate provision appears to be established by the act, for securing the obedience of the militia to the call of the Executive of the United States.

It would seem essential, that any law which the Congress should pass upon the subject of the militia, should contain within itself all the necessary provisions for its complete execution.

The late experiment proves, at least in some parts, that the laws were inefficient, and had it not been for voluntary zeal, which came to its aid, the community might have experienced great evils.

It would appear to be essential, that when the militia are in actual service, they ought to be bound by the military code of the United States.

The enrolment of men of the ages specified in the act, notwithstanding the exemptions, holding them responsible for military service, and enforcing the same, appears to be a circumstance which may operate injuriously to the industry and convenience of the community.

Of the returns enjoined by the tenth section of the said act, the following only have been received.

	From sixteen to forty.	Forty to sixty.	Total.
Massachusetts,	54,428	22,819	77,247
Connecticut,	-	-	15,851
New Jersey,	-	-	25,887
Georgia,	-	-	10,120

Whether the act in question is susceptible of such alterations and amendments, on its present principles, as will secure the advantages to be derived from a well organized militia, or whether a limited, but select, and efficient corps of militia, formed on a principle of rotation, or otherwise, and taken from the classes least injurious to the industry of the community, would not better fulfil that object, and at the same time better comport with economy are questions which the wisdom of Congress alone is competent to decide.

All which is submitted,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 19, 1794.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 19, 1794.

In pursuance of the instructions of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War respectfully submits to the House of Representatives copies of the instructions to the engineers, for erecting the fortifications for the defence of the sea ports of the United States, and their reports thereupon.

It is respectfully suggested, that the plans which accompany these papers are considered as essential parts of the reports of the engineers; but as it is not practical to have them copied in any reasonable time for the use of the House, the originals are submitted, with the hope, that the House will please to order their return to this office, as soon as the subject of their inquiry shall be finished:

North Carolina has ceded certain places to the United States, conformably to the act hereunto subjoined, and the Legislature of Maryland has passed a resolve, giving permission for the erection of fortifications; a copy of which is also hereunto subjoined. And it is also understood that the Legislature of Rhode Island has passed an act, ceding the jurisdiction of Goat Island, in the harbor of New York.

No particulars were given to any superintendents from the subscriber; they were appointed generally by the Governors, and were to superintend the actual execution of the works, under the orders of the engineers.

The agents were appointed in the line of the Treasury Department, for the purchase of materials and obtaining the labor, and to receive from, and to account to, the treasury, for sums expended for the fortifications.

The mounting of the artillery being an incidental expense of the Ordnance Department, has been paid by warrants from this office.

All which is respectfully submitted,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

LAWS OF NORTH CAROLINA.

At a General Assembly, begun and held at Newbern, on the seventh day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand and ninety-four, in the nineteenth year of the independence of said State, being the second year of the said Assembly.

CHAP. I.

An act to cede to the United States certain Lands, upon the condition therein mentioned.

Whereas the Congress of the United States have passed an act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States, in which is comprised Cape Fear river, and Ocracock inlet, and also to erect a light-house on the head land of Cape Hatteras: And whereas it is expedient that the United States should have the exclusive jurisdiction of a sufficient quantity of land, on which said forts and light-houses shall be erected:

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That part of the public ground, laid out by the commissioners of Smithville for a fort on Cape Fear river, including part of the ground whereon Fort Johnson formerly stood, with the exclusive jurisdiction thereof, shall be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the United States of America, under the condition hereinafter mentioned.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the exclusive jurisdiction of Beacon Island, in the harbor of Ocracock, and four acres of land at the head land of Cape Hatteras, and also as much of the town of Smithville, adjoining Fort Johnson, as may be found necessary for the said fort, not exceeding six acres, shall be ceded and stand vested in the United States, as soon as the proprietors of said lands shall convey the same to the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the above mentioned lands are, and shall be, ceded to the United States upon the express condition, that the fortifications, light houses, and beacons, for which the said lands are ceded, or to be ceded, shall be erected within three years, and be continued and kept up forever thereafter, for the public use.

And be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to debar or hinder any of the officers of this State from serving any process, or levying executions, within the limits ceded by this act to the United States, in the same manner, and to the same effect, as if this act had never been made.

MARYLAND.

BY THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, December 25, 1793.

Whereas the United States may think it necessary to erect a fort, arsenal, or other military works or buildings on Whitestone Point, for the public defence:

Therefore, Resolved, That, upon the application of the President of the United States to the Governor, for permission to erect a fort, arsenal, or other military works on the said point, for the purpose aforesaid, the Governor shall, and may, grant the same, with the consent of the owner of the soil.

NOTE. The above plans and maps were returned to the War Department.

FORTIFICATIONS FROM NEW LONDON TO PORTLAND, INCLUSIVE.

Instructions to Mr. Bechet Rochefontaine, acting as temporary Engineer in the service of the United States.

In pursuance of the directions of the President of the United States, you are hereby appointed an engineer, for the purpose of fortifying the ports and harbors herein after mentioned, viz: New London, in the State of Connecticut, Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, Boston, Marblehead, Salem, Gloucester, and Portland, in the State of Massachusetts, and Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire.

You are therefore immediately to repair to the ports to be fortified in the said States, respectively, and in case the Governors should be near any of the said ports, you are to wait upon them and exhibit these instructions. But if the Governors should be at any considerable distance from your route, you are respectfully to notify them of your appointment, enclose them a copy of these instructions, and inform them that you have repaired to the ports aforesaid, in order to make the necessary surveys and investigations relatively to your mission, which you will submit to their consideration, and take their orders thereon.

As soon as you shall receive their approbation of your plans, you are to construct the works, and to execute them with all possible vigor and despatch.

The following is an extract of the estimate on which the appropriations for the fortifications have been founded. The proportion of expense, therefore, herein stated for the ports aforesaid, must not be exceeded, viz:

NEW LONDON, Twelve heavy Cannon.
The formation of a parapet of earth for twelve pieces,	- - - - -	$375 00
Facing twelve embrasures, at fourteen dollars ninety-eight cents each,	- - - - -	179 76
The expense of twelve platforms, at twenty-five dollars seventy-five cents each,	- - - - -	309 00
A redoubt, constructed of a form to be adapted to the nature of the ground, to be equal to 100 feet square,	- - - - -	650 00
A magazine,	- - - - -	200 00
Embrasures and platforms for four field pieces,	- - - - -	160 52
A block house, or barracks, for fifty men,	- - - - -	500 00
For pickets, palisadoes, and to provide for articles difficult to foresee or enumerate,	- - - - -	375 00
		$2,749 28
To be garrisoned by 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, 2 musicians, 17 privates.
GROTON, Twelve Pieces.
The same expense as at New London, and to be garrisoned by the same number of troops,	- - - - -	$2,749 28
GOAT ISLAND, Eight Pieces.
To put the works in order,	- - - - -	$3,000 00
NEWPORT, Three Pieces.
On travelling carriages, so that no battery may be necessary to be erected.	- - - - -
Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 2 sergeants, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 24 privates.	- - - - -
BOSTON, CASTLE ISLAND, Thirty-six Pieces.
To put the works in order, estimated at	- - - - -	$6,000 00
GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, Twelve Pieces.
The expense the same as at New London,	- - - - -	$2,749 28

The Castle to be garrisoned by 1 captain, 1 subaltern, 2 sergeants, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 24 privates.
 Governor's Island, 1 2 2 17 17

MARBLEHEAD, Eight Pieces.

Expense of the construction of the parapet, embrasures, and platforms,	-	-	-	$573 84
A block house,	-	-	-	500 00
A magazine,	-	-	-	200 00
Contingencies,	-	-	-	150 00
				$1,423 84

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 17 privates.

SALEM, Eight Pieces.

The expense the same as at Marblehead,	-	-	-	$1,423 84

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 17 privates.

CAPE ANN, GLOUCESTER, Eight Pieces.

The expense the same as at Marblehead,	-	-	-	$1,423 84
--	---	---	---	------------

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 17 privates.

PORTLAND, Twelve Pieces.

The expense the same as at New London,	-	-	-	$2,749 28
--	---	---	---	------------

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 17 privates.

PORTSMOUTH, Nine Pieces.

A parapet for nine pieces,	-	-	-	$281 75
Embrasures and platforms for nine pieces,	-	-	-	360 57

A magazine,	-	-	-	200 00
Block house or barracks,	-	-	-	500 00
Pickets, palisadoes, and contingencies,	-	-	-	375 00
				$2,527 34

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 17 privates.

But the peculiar situation of Newport, and its importance to a marine enemy, will justify a greater portion of expense than is contemplated in the estimate. A strong redoubt or two, upon the heights near the town, ought to be constructed; the experience of the American, English, and French troops, who successively occupied that place during the late war, will have pointed out the spots most proper to be occupied. Upon mature consideration, therefore, it appears that Newport, or rather the ground in its neighborhood, ought to be so fortified as to prevent any sudden possession of that place by an enemy, from which our commerce would suffer excessively.

It will be readily perceived, by the lowness of the estimate, that the parapets of the works intended to be erected are to be of earth, or where that cannot easily be obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with strong timber, and filled in with such earth as can be had.

It is, however, conceived that, in most cases, earth may be procured, and that a parapet made thereof, will not only form a solid defence, but even be durable, if the earth be tenacious, and properly sloped and sodded inside and out, and the seed of knotgrass sown, so as to bind the earth and sods together.

It is, however, apprehended that the embrasures, made in this manner, would suffer from the explosion of the powder from the cannon, and that, therefore, where the batteries are not en barbette, that the embrasures ought to be framed with joist, and faced with plank of two inches thick.

When the batteries are to be erected on points of land, islands, or other places at a distance from the towns intended to be defended, they ought to be covered or secured by a redoubt, or other enclosed work, in which the garrison should reside constantly, either in a barrack or a strong block house, as shall be judged most expedient. But, in general, as the garrisons will be weak in numbers, a block house, mounting one or two small pieces of cannon in its upper story, will be more secure, and therefore to be preferred. These, however, ought not to be much, if any, exposed to the fire of heavy cannon. A block house will not contain more than fifty men; if the garrison, therefore, should be enlarged, tents must be used.

The redoubts, in general, ought to be of a size to contain five hundred men, so as to resist a sudden enterprise of an enemy; and, perhaps, the idea ought to be embraced, in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed at present to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and calked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have these magazines properly ventilated and free from dampness. They are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed, will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy, either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will also direct what part of your works shall be protected by frizee, and what by palisadoes, or whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barbette with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries, they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures. The batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground, on which the batteries and works are to be erected, with all the combinations and effects depending thereon, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governor.

It has not been intended, by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be executed. Outlines only have been given, to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

Some person, in whose ingenuity and industry confidence can be placed, will be appointed at the said ports, respectively, to superintend the actual execution of the works according to your directions. Arrangements will also be made by him, or some other person, to obtain the necessary workmen, implements, and materials, which will be required in this business: but every thing must be previously calculated and estimated by you.

Although the business herein entrusted to your charge, is, of itself, of an highly honorable nature, and strongly evincive of the confidence of the President of the United States, which would probably enhance your reputation, yet it is explicitly to be understood by you, that the employment is only temporary, and not conferring or involving any military rank whatever.

For a compensation of your services and personal expenses, you will be allowed and paid at the rate of four dollars per day, while you shall be employed. For all reasonable extra expenses, such as necessary boat hire, and persons to assist in your surveys, you will be allowed; but for those you must keep regular accounts, and take receipts.

You are to deliver to the Governors copies of all your plans, surveys, soundings, &c. and also transmit copies of the same to this office.

You are also to make a weekly report to this office of your proceedings.

A reverberatory furnace, for red hot balls, must be erected for each battery.

You are hereby authorized to have made, in all cases where your judgment shall direct, new semi-circle carriages for cannon, now used on the sea-coast of France, instead of the old garrison carriages.

This improvement of firing en barbette will prevent the necessity of embrasures, which, in most cases, serve no other purpose but as a trap to catch the enemy's balls, and kill the defenders of a battery.

It is true, the expense will be greatly enhanced by adopting this improvement, but this will be lessened in some degree by saving the expense of the embrasures and platforms.

It will be proper, in most cases, where the earth works are to be erected, to have them done by contract. I have written to the agents upon this subject, and I also request your attention thereto.

It is probable that one or two sub-engineers may be appointed under your orders, as your line will be very extensive.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 29th day of March, 1794.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

A General Return of the Situation of the Fortifications of the Seaport Towns in the States of New England.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT.

NEW LONDON.—On the 12th April, his Excellency the Governor of the State came from Norwich to New London, to visit the two sides of the harbor, and was pleased to approve of the plan of fortification, which has since been partly executed.

It consists, on the New London side of the harbor, of a citadel in stone masonry, bomb proof, covering a powder magazine, and will serve for the garrison to live in in time of peace. The citadel is surrounded with batteries and glacis, to cover it from the direct fire of ships of war, and to scour the entrance of the harbor and the neighborhood of the citadel with cannon and musketry.

The artillery consists of six eighteen and twenty-four pounders, on coast carriages; four nine and six pounders, on travelling carriages.

There is also a reverberatory furnace for heating balls.

The fortification of that side is nearly completed, and requires only to be trimmed, which will be done either this fall or early in the next spring.

On the Groton side of the harbor, the fortifications consist of a fort, made of earth and sods, containing a citadel, of brick masonry, covering a powder magazine, bomb proof, and serving for the garrison to live in; and a battery, near the harbor, under the protection of the fort, with a covered way, communicating from one to the other. The battery is also to be defended by a guard house, of brick masonry, with a powder magazine, bomb proof, under it.

The artillery of the fort will consist of three eighteen and twenty-four pounders, on coast carriages, and four six pounders, on travelling carriages; that of the battery, of five eighteen and twenty-four pounders, to be mounted on coast carriages. A reverberatory furnace will also be erected in it.

The fortification of that side of the harbor is far from being complete; the want of labor has been, in a great measure, the cause of the delay.

The citadel will be completed and covered before winter, as well as the powder magazine. The repairing of the old fort is only begun, and will be continued in the beginning of next spring.

The sum granted by Congress	-	-	-	-	$5,498 56
That expended to this day, is about	-	-	-	$4,500 00
To complete New London Fort,	-	-	-	300 00

Sum to be provided to complete the defence of New London, - - - - - $1,100 00

For the mounting of the artillery, the Secretary of the Treasury has granted a first sum of - - - - - 250 00

It will cost for the mounting of the guns, stating, upon an average, 90 dollars for every coast carriage, and 60 dollars for every travelling carriage, for guns or howitzers, $1,740 00

For a reverberatory furnace, for the battery of Groton, that of New London being erected, 100 00

The sum to be provided for these two objects, - - - - - $1,590 00

Total sum to be granted for New London, - - - - - $2,690 00

The garrison on the New London side will consist, in time of peace, of twenty-two men.

In time of war, fifty men.

The fort and citadel may afford a cover, in case of an attack, to one thousand men.

The garrison of the fort and battery, on the Groton side of the harbor, in time of peace, twenty-two men.

On account of the battery and guard house, in time of war, eighty men.

In case of an attack by an enemy, eight hundred men.

There is in the fort and batteries, a sufficient number of good cannon for the armament of New London and Groton.

The land occupied by the fortifications is the same that was formerly fortified, and is the property of individuals. The agent at New London has, in consequence of a requisition for the purpose, attempted to buy it. The extravagant price set upon it, and other difficulties in the way of procuring it, have induced the agent to make an application to the Legislature of the State for the purpose.

It is to be observed, that the object of the fortifications on the two sides of the harbor of New London is, the defence of the entrance of the harbor, by a cross fire of heavy cannon, with red hot balls, on shipping attempting to force their way through, and the protection of the trade in the harbor. Those batteries are well secured against a surprise, or any sudden attack. In order to take possession of them, or to operate their destruction, the enemy must undertake a regular attack: in that case, the whole force of the country ought to be brought against him.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT.—On the 8th of May, his Excellency the Governor of the State visited the harbor and the ports on Rhode Island, to be taken possession of. The security of the harbor and island, which consists in the defending the entrance of the harbor, and securing, by all means, a free and open communication with the interior parts of the State, for the militia to come to the assistance of Newport in case of an attack.

The Governor was pleased to approve of the system of defence, which has since been partly executed.

It consists of a fort on Goat Island, with a citadel, in stone masonry, bomb proof, serving for the garrison to live in, and having under it two powder magazines. The whole is nearly completed.

At Tomany Hill, a citadel in brick masonry, serving for the garrison to live in, with a powder magazine, bomb proof, under it. This will be completed before the winter.

At Butts Hill, a citadel in every respect equal to the above on Tomany Hill. This by want of means, has been postponed to another year.

At Howland's Ferry, a battery and a guard house, in brick masonry, with a powder house, bomb proof, under it. The guard house and powder magazine are executed. The battery is contracted for, and will be erected before the spring.

The sum granted by Congress was,	$5,000
Expended to this day, or contracted for to complete the works begun as above mentioned,	6,104
There remains unprovided for, a sum of		$1,104
Also, to erect the citadel, magazine, &c. at Butts Hill,		1,200
Total of the sum to be provided to complete the above defence of Newport, Rhode Island,		$2,304

The artillery of the works will consist, at the fort on Goat Island, of 16, 18 and 24 pounders, on coast carriages, and two 6 pounders, on travelling carriages.

A reverberatory furnace is erected there.

At Tomany Hill, of four 12 pounders, or howitzers, on travelling carriages.

At Butts Hill, of four 12 pounders; or howitzers, on travelling carriages.

At the battery at Howland's Ferry, of four 18 and 24 pounders, on coast carriages, a reverberatory furnace is also to be erected there.

The mounting of the above artillery and the furnace will cost, $2,600

The first sum granted for the same by the Secretary of the Treasury, $500

There remains to be provided for that object, a sum of 2,100

Total of the money to be provided, for the fortification and artillery, above stated, 4,404

The possession of Rhode Island, and the harbor of Newport, is so important to an European nation at war with the United States, that it will perhaps be thought necessary to increase its defence, and to provide it even against a regular expedition; in that case it would be necessary to cover the fort, on Goat Island, with a glacis, and covered way all round, which will produce the double advantage of securing the parapets of the fort against the direct fire of the guns of ships forcing their passage up, and of affording a cover for a larger garrison in case of an attack. This proposed addition to the fortifications of Goat Island being executed, it might then withstand even a regular attack.

The glacis and covered way, $3,000

For the mounting of twelve pieces of cannon, 12 and 18 pounders, on new garrison carriages, and six 6 pounders, or howitzers, on travelling carriages, 1,560

Total of the additional expense, $4,560

The garrison of Goat Island will be, in time of peace, men, 31

In time of war, 100

In case of an attack, if executed as it is now, without any additional works, 500

With the additional works, 2,000

The garrison of Tomany Hill will consist, in time of peace, man, 1

In time of war, men, 50

In case of an attack of all the inhabitants of Newport, and of the Island, the garrison at Butts Hill will consist

In time of peace, of man, 1

In time of war, men, 60

In case of an invasion of the militia of the State, the garrison of Howland's Ferry battery will be of one man in time of peace, and in time of war, ten men of the garrison of Butts Hill will be stationed there monthly.

The grounds occupied by the fortifications, now erected with leave of the owners, have not yet been bought, owing to the exorbitant demand of some, and other difficulties referred to the Secretary of War.

It is to be observed, that there are, at present, but eight guns at Rhode Island, viz. three 24's, three 18's, and two 6's.

STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON.—On the 25th of May, his Honor the Lieutenant Governor, elected, since that time, Governor of the State of Massachusetts, declared to the engineers, that he did not find himself empowered to approve of the execution of the law of the United States, respecting the fortification of the seaport towns in the State, without the advice of the Legislature, meeting a few days afterwards. His Excellency, however, gave orders to the officers of the Executive of the State, to the State garrison of the Castle Island, and to the gentlemen, select men of every seaport town, directed to be fortified, to assist, every one in his capacity, the engineer in his reconnoitering and surveys.

On the first of June, his Excellency was furnished with a general plan of defence for the harbor of Boston.

On the 4th of June, a committee of the Legislature, appointed for the purpose, called on the engineer, to be present at one of their conferences respecting the fortification of the harbor, and that of Castle Island particularly.

On the 8th, the said committee visited Castle Island, with the engineer, that being the only post in the State that the Legislature would have any thing to do with as to fortifying.

On the 11th, his Excellency permitted the engineer to visit the seaport towns of Salem, Marblehead, and Cape Ann, until the Legislature should come to a determination on the questions, proposed in the address of the Governor, respecting the fortification of the harbor of the State.

On the 20th, his Excellency authorized the engineer to proceed to the State of New Hampshire, the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts having not yet come to any vote on the subject of fortifications.

On the 24th of June, the Secretary of War having directed the engineer to repair to Portland as soon as possible, his Excellency was informed by the engineer, that he should go to Portland from Portsmouth, agreeable to the Secretary's orders, and as the local situation of the former would render it very long to wait for his Excellency's approbation, after the plan of fortification should be formed, the engineer proposed, as most advisable, to act in concert with the select men of that town, and even to begin the construction of fortifications, such as should be approved by those gentlemen: his Excellency's further orders would, however, regulate the conduct of the engineer, and his silence on the subject would be construed as a consent to the engineer's proposal.

PORTLAND.

On the 14th of July, the select men of Portland, previously advised by the Governor of the arrival of the engineer, visited the harbor. On the 15th, the citizens, in a legal town meeting, authorised the select men to purchase, in behalf of the town, and for the United States, the ground necessary for the erecting of the fortifications for the defence of the harbor.

The 21st July, the select men having approved the plan of fortification, and the Governor having made no objection to the plan of conduct proposed as above, the engineer began the works, which consist of—

A fort erected on the hill, formerly occupied by the fort, with parapets, supported by stone walls and sods.

A citadel of brick masonry, serving for the garrison to live in, and covering a magazine, bomb proof.

A battery near the harbor, with a guard house, in brick masonry, to defend with musketry the guns of the battery, and a powder magazine, bomb proof. Also, a covered communication from the fort to the battery.

The sum granted by the United States, was $2,749 23

The Secretary of War has granted in addition, 900 00

The artillery of the fort will consist of four 6 and 12 pounders, mounted on travelling carriages.

At the battery of ten pieces, 32, 18, and 12 pounders, mounted on coast carriages.

Also, a reverberatory furnace, for heating balls.

The works are completed, or will be so before the winter, with the sum above mentioned.

The mounting of the artillery will cost,

$1,200

The Secretary of the Treasury has granted,

250

Sum to be provided for the artillery,

$950

The garrison of Portland, in time of peace, is to be twenty-three men.

In time of war, it ought to be one hundred men.

In case of an attack, it will be the rendezvous of the militia, and may contain five hundred men.

If it were thought necessary to cover that post, which is now secured against any sudden attack, against a regular expedition by land and sea, it would be necessary to surround the fort with two advanced posts and glacis.

The two advanced posts and glacis would cost

$5,000 00

The mounting 12 pieces of cannon on howitzers, in addition to the above, in garrison and travelling carriages,

700 00

2,800 00

Total of the additional expense, on that plan,

8,500 00

The garrison of Portland, with the additional works, above mentioned, might be 2,000 men.

The artillery now in the fort and battery at Portland, is to be replaced, except one 18 pounder, as soon as good ones can be procured, but if the said guns can bear proving, there is a sufficient number for the armament of the works now executed.

Four acres of land, for the fortifications, have been bought for $68.

On the 29th July, the engineer waited on his Excellency the Governor of Massachusetts, at Boston: the Legislature not having decided any thing respecting the fortifications of the State, his Excellency could not give any approbation to the erecting of any throughout the State, even at Portland, where the select men, and town meeting, had irregularly acted, in purchasing land for the United States, without being authorized to do it by the Legislature of the State.

On the 16th of August, the Secretary of War authorized the engineer to erect fortifications, according to the law of the United States, at Salem, Marblehead, and Cape Ann.

SALEM.—The inhabitants of Salem, in a legal town meeting, unanimously voted a cession to the United States of the ground which should be thought necessary for the defence of their harbor; immediately thereupon the works were begun. They consist of a fort, erected on the old fort called Fort William, in masonry and sods; a brick citadel, calculated for the garrison to live in, and covering a powder magazine, bomb proof.

The artillery of that fort will consist of six pieces; 24, 18 and 12 pounders on coast carriages; four pieces, 6 and 12 pounders, on travelling carriages; a reverberatory furnace; also, two pieces, 18 and 24 pounders, to arm the battery on Juniper's Point in time of war.

A number of old guns, now there, will serve, if they bear proof, until good ones can be provided.

The sum granted by the United States for the fortifications, was,

$1,423 84

The Secretary of War has granted a sum of 600 00

That sum will nearly complete the works intended to be erected.

The mounting the artillery and furnace will cost,

$1,060 00

The Secretary of the Treasury has granted a first sum of 250 00

Sum to be provided for the artillery,

$810 00

The garrison of Salem is to be, in time of peace, of 23 men.

On account of Juniper battery, in time of war, ought to be 60 men.

In case of an attack, the militia will occupy the above fort, Juniper's battery, and the old Fort Lee, securing the passage to the neck. In that case, 12 or 15 hundred men may fight with great certainty of success.

The situation of Salem is such, that it would not be advisable to spend more money, than what is necessary to complete the fort actually begun.

MARBLEHEAD.—For the reason alluded to above, the fortification at Marblehead was not commenced before the 1st September. It consists of a battery to defend the entrance of the harbor, and citadel, of brick masonry, to defend the battery erected on the spot occupied by the old fort, covering a powder magazine, bomb proof, and calculated for the garrison to live in.

The artillery will consist of six 42, 18, and 24 pounders on coast carriages, and four 6 and 9 pounders, or howitzers, on travelling carriages.

Also, a reverberatory furnace.

The sum granted by the United States for the fortifications, was

$1,423 84

The Secretary of War has granted an additional sum of 900 00

That sum will nearly complete the works intended and begun.

The mounting the artillery, and furnace, will cost,

$700 00

The Secretary of the Treasury has already granted

250 00

Sum to be provided for the artillery,

450 00

The garrison of Marblehead, in time of peace, is to be 23 men.

In time of war it ought to be 40 men.

In case of an attack there may be covered in the fort and citadel two or three hundred men.

The situation of Marblehead is such, that the works erecting now are sufficient to put the harbor in a respectable state of defence.

There is a number of old guns in the fort which, after being proved, may serve until good ones can be provided; there are also four good travelling carriages, and many implements of artillery, which have been deducted from the expense contemplated for mounting the artillery.

The ground was the property of the town; the inhabitants, in a town meeting, have ceded it to the United States. The property of a citizen was blended with that of the town, and was necessary for the citadel, and for the use of the garrison; it has been bought for the sum of 310 dollars.

CAPE ANN.—On the first of September the fortifications at Cape Ann were begun; the delay is to be ascribed to the same cause as above mentioned.

The defence of Cape Ann consists of a fort erected on the spot where the fort formerly was, and a citadel covering a powder magazine, bomb proof, and calculated for the garrison to live in.

The artillery consists of six 18 and 24 pounders, mounted on coast carriages, and two 12 and 9 pounders on travelling carriages.

Also a furnace for heating balls.

The sum granted by the United States was

$1,423 84

The Secretary of War has granted an additional sum of 600 00

This total sum of $2,023 84 is thought to be equal to the expense to be incurred by the works begun.
The mounting of the artillery and furnace will cost	$760 00
The Secretary of the Treasury has granted	250 00
	<hr/>
Sum to be provided for that object,	$510 00

The garrison at Cape Ann, in time of peace, is to be of 23 men.

In time of war it ought to be of 50 men.

In case of an attack, the militia might defend the fort and citadel, and man a battery at the mouth of the harbor with 500 men.

It is to be observed, that the resources of the three last places, in mechanics and laborers, are so small, that it has been utterly impossible, even by granting higher wages, to make up for the unforeseen delay above mentioned, and it is, therefore, very uncertain whether they will be put in a state of defence before the winter.

Boston.—The defence of the harbor has, by order of the Secretary of War, been left to be erected at another time.

Upon a general view, the defence of that harbor will consist in fortifying Castle Island and Governor's Island. The repairing of the battery on Castle Island, and erecting in the centre of it a fort, with bomb proof, for the garrison, will cost $20,000

The repairing of the fort on Governor's Island, erecting batteries, and building a citadel, bomb proof, and a powder magazine, will cost	6,000
The artillery will consist, on Castle Island, of 20 pieces of cannon on coast carriages,	1,800
12 pieces of light artillery, or howitzers, on travelling carriages,	720
4 mortars,	200
2 reverberatory furnaces,	200

PORTSMOUTH, New Hampshire.—On the 30th June, his Excellency, the Governor of New Hampshire, visited the harbor, and has approved of the plan of fortification which has since been executed.

It consists of a fort of masonry and sods, erected on the point where the light house stands, with a citadel calculated for the garrison to live in, and covering a powder magazine bomb proof.

The artillery consists of seven pieces of heavy cannon, 42, 24, and 18 pounders, on coast carriages, and six pieces of light artillery, to be mounted on travelling carriages.

Also, a reverberatory furnace.

The probable expense for the others, and for the reverberatory furnace, will be	1,180

In case of an attack, the militia ought to have there	600

The peculiar situation of the harbor of Portsmouth renders any expense for its security, over the sums calculated above, almost entirely useless; yet, if any addition were contemplated to be necessary, it would be, to put the fort, which defends the entrance of the harbor perfectly well, in a condition to withstand an attack by land. That might be done, by covering the side of the fort looking toward the little harbor by a glacis and covered way. The expense attending that additional defence may be calculated at $2,000.

A gun boat might also be stationed in the little harbor, for the protection of coasters.

The ground occupied by the fort is the property of the United States.

It ought to be remarked, after viewing the state of defence of the seaport towns in New England, that the only object aimed at has been the security of the harbors against an attack by water, by rendering their entrance as dangerous as possible to an enemy, and the protection of the trade in the same, which end is supposed to have been attained. Every battery is secured against a sudden attack and surprise, by a citadel, in masonry, almost within reach of the bayonet from the guns. But none, except the harbor of Newport, has been secured against a combined and regular attack by land and by water. It is, particularly, when the enemy shows a disposition to lay siege to the forts above mentioned, that the force of the country ought to be turned out against him.

FORTIFICATIONS, NEW YORK.

Special instructions to Charles Vincent, acting as a temporary Engineer in the service of the United States.

SIR: The President of the United States, considering the importance of New York, from its local situation, and the difficulty of fortifying it with small means, is desirous of having the separate opinions of several engineers upon the subject. You will, therefore, please to repair to that city, and, if the Governor be present, show him these instructions. If, however, he should be still absent, you will wait upon General Lamb, the collector of the port, and request of him a boat and hands to attend you in your inquiries, and he will, also, be so good as to obtain some gentlemen to accompany you who are perfectly acquainted with the harbor. In order to assist you in your judgment, I transmit you herewith a map of the harbor from Sandy Hook up to the city, I also enclose you the estimate of the sums which have been appropriated by Congress to this object.

Twenty of these pieces may be on travelling carriages, so as to be moved as circumstances might require.

It will be readily perceived that the amount of this appropriation will not effectually fortify an harbor so circumstanced as New York. But this sum cannot be exceeded, and all your estimates are to be conformed accordingly.

The works that are the most important are to be pointed out in your plans, and every thing which shall be undertaken is to form hereafter a part of the general plan.

The parapets which have been contemplated, have been of earth. It is conceived that, in most places, earth may be procured of a tenacious quality, and that a parapet formed thereof, would be respectable, as well for its defence as its duration, more especially if it is properly stopped and sodded, and sown with a certain species of grass called knotgrass.

It will depend upon your judgment at what places to have embrasures, or what to fire en barbette with the new carriage, such as are used on the sea coast of France.

It is, however, apprehended, that in all cases where embrasures are necessary, they ought to be framed of joist, and faced with two inch plank. Embrasures formed of earth are too liable to be injured.

It will be necessary that each plan should be accompanied with an estimate of the expense, and pointing out the number of cannon required, and also stating the number of men which would be necessary to finish the work within a given period, say three months.

The batteries which are to be erected on points of land, islands, or other places at a distance from New York, ought to be covered or secured by a redoubt, or other enclosed work, in which the garrison should reside constantly, either in a barrack, or a strong blockhouse, as shall be judged most expedient. But, in general, as the garrisons will be weak in numbers, a block house mounting one or two small pieces of cannon in its upper story will be more secure, and therefore to be preferred. These, however, ought not to be much, if any, exposed to the fire of heavy cannon. A block house will not contain more than fifty men. If the garrison, therefore, should be enlarged, tents must be used.

The redoubts in general ought to be of a size to contain five hundred men, so as to resist a sudden enterprise of an enemy, and perhaps the idea ought to be embraced in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed at present to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and calked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have the magazines properly ventilated, and free from dampness. They are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed, will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy, either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will also direct what parts of your works shall be protected by a fraize, and what by palisades, or whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barbette, with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries, they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures—the batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, with all the combinations and effects depending thereon, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governor. It has not been intended by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be executed. Outlines only have been given to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

A reverberatory furnace for red hot balls must be erected for each battery.

Having finished your plans, you are to lay one copy before the Governor, and to transmit another to me, with full details of the reasons for your opinions. It is to be desired that you instantly undertake this business, in order that you may be ready to receive further orders, which will be given to you as soon as you shall be able to execute them.

I enclose you two letters, the one for the Governor, and the other for General Lamb, the Collector, who, you will please to observe, is requested to advance you one hundred dollars, if you request it.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 1st day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

General observations on the defence of the Harbor and City of New York, by Mr. Vincent.—New York, 1794.

There is no need of a long meditation on the means of defence to be employed in New York, to obtain a certitude that they ought to tend only to ensure the safety of the harbor; and this place has no attack to fear from troops landed or arrived in the extent of the State of which it is the metropolis. The difficulties to keep the necessary communications between an army landed and its fleet, the repeated combats which these troops, when landed, should have to maintain against men provided with all necessaries, and the number of which would be daily increasing, against men defending their properties, with that valor and enthusiasm which nothing but a just and well known cause can inspire, offer so many insuperable obstacles, that they leave no room to believe that an enemy will ever attempt a landing that could not but prove fatal to him.

We can easily form the same judgment of all enterprises from an enemy already master of land communications with the State of New York, and without supporting our opinion with the glorious events of the late war, number of reasons demonstrate the absurdity of an attempt of this nature, which will never be thought of against this flourishing city.

We will not, consequently, consider in this moment the city of New York as susceptible to be attacked by an enemy, reduced to make long approaches by land, but we shall be taken up with the only thought of ensuring the safety of its harbor, which being at this moment entirely open for ships of the first rate, gives too much foundation to fear lest an enterprising enemy might come to an anchor in it with very indifferent forces, destroy all defenceless merchant vessels, and, at the best, lay the city under enormous contributions.

Such an unheard of calamity is not only possible, but much to be dreaded at the present moment; and when we reflect on the risks one of the finest harbors in the world is exposed to; one that nature, and the social institutions of the inhabitants it enriches, leads by long strides to become the greatest and most flourishing emporium of the two worlds; we cannot forbear a sentiment mixed of dread and regret, when we see that nothing has been done yet towards the safety of a point of such importance, and we feel a pressing desire to see its defence established, towards which has proved more generous than we generally observe it to be.

Effectively, on casting one's eyes on the map, we see that the signal man placed in the light house, can long before hand give notice of the forces discovered by him in sea. Signals agreed upon can give an instantaneous warning to all persons committed to the defence of the city and harbor; of the imminent danger, first important advantage to be obtained, and would highly facilitate the dispositions of defence.

Arrived at the entrance of Sandy Hook, the hostile ships will have yet twenty miles to run before they can annoy the city and the vessels in its harbor, and to how many obstacles is not that long passage subjected? they must by day, and only during high water, follow with a steady attention, and winds infinitely variable, follow a winding channel, before to arrive to that part of the same channel where the contracted current increases its rapidity, and where the wind leaves generally the entering ships, and abandons them to all the means of defence so easy to establish in that part.*

If we suppose the first difficulties presented by nature to be conquered, and they cannot be so without subjecting the enemy to a great loss, when art will join its resources, it is, we think, out of doubt, that the new obstacles laid in the enemy's way, by means of the islands so happily situated in the river, will oblige him to give up any idea of forcing the entry of the port, or will be at least sufficient to make him repent his temerity, if he should dare to attempt it, what we cannot believe.

Having thus delineated a true picture of the numerous advantages offered by nature for the defence of New York harbor, we will immediately enter into particulars on what additions we think art ought to make to it.

One should, in reading this, have constantly the map before one's eyes, as we have it in writing; after having, however, sufficiently reconnoitred the ground.

There is no doubt but the soonest one may annoy the enemy attempting to force the entrance of the harbor, the best it will be; and this idea creates naturally a desire to establish crossed fires on the narrow entrance of the channel, ahead of Sandy Hook; but the difficulties and expenses arising from constructions exposed to an open sea, which must be terrible at certain times, combined with the hardships a garrison exposed in the middle of the waves and difficult to provide, should be subjected to, have led to think, that on a channel of such length, and presenting such good positions, though more approached, it would be better at the present moment to establish nothing ahead of that point; it will be advantageous, however, to have at Sandy Hook's tower, two pieces mounted in battery, the use of which will be to give the signals agreed upon, these signals will be repeated by Stag Stake Fort, and successively by Beedle's and the city.

By means of these signals, the city and the defences, whatever they may be, will be readily informed of the moment when the hostile ships will enter Sandy Hook's bars, and the first obstacle destined to oppose them in the narrows will be ready to be displayed in all their latitude.

They will consist on the left shore of the battery, served as well as all other ones to be constructed, with red hot balls, and mounting fifteen pieces of the largest caliber on coast carriages, having their motions in the horizontal and vertical plans; to these fifteen pieces will be added four ten inch mortars for this battery, the gorge of which will be slightly shut, as it ought to be commanded and fully seen by an earth redoubt to be established on the steep shore superior to it; this battery will besides be founded on the rising ground advancing two hundred fathoms in the narrows, and covered only with five or six feet water at low water; it seems useless to say that the use of this battery and of the redoubt will be to procure crossing fires on the channel, by means of the batteries placed on the opposite shore; two pieces on field carriages should also be placed on the lowest point of the same left shore, where the passage widening forms the beginning of New York Bay. These two pieces, which would discover the whole bay, might be protected by a second redoubt, which being connected with the first by a line well traced, should form a kind of entrenched camp, where might repair the militia troops, if, against all likelihood, the enemy should attempt a landing in York Bay to come and take the batteries. This act of temerity should lay him under the necessity to master the entrenched camp, which would give a considerable advantage over him, for nothing can be of greater moment than to cause the enemy to lose a precious time, during which forces may be collected to complete his destruction.

We think that the means of defence, to be established on the left shore of the Narrows, can be reduced to what we have mentioned; and although we have spoken of two redoubts, a joining line to form an entrenched camp, it is easily understood that this powerful means of defence is no way necessary at this present moment, and even that, until the low battery be established, it will be sufficient to erect earth batteries, which may be constructed with very little expense, and in a short while, on the steep shore, the elevation of which is far better adapted to the defence to be obtained than the level of the sea, that will always expose such low batteries to all shots directed below the horizon, either by the enemy, either by our own batteries of the opposite shore; these shots making generally ricochets with great success; but the establishing of the low battery, shortening by two hundred fathoms the distance of the fires, we have thought it our duty not to neglect the advantage.

Having spoken of the defence to be established on the left shore of the Narrows, we shall now take in consideration the right shore, which is much more interesting on account of the vessels coming much closer to it, driven by the currents, and endeavoring to avoid the advancing high grounds.

A battery mounted with fifteen pieces of the largest caliber will be established in Sandy Bay, above the level of the highest tides, its gorge will be shut, and it will have four mortars and flanks, mounted with two four pounders, to defend it.

Above this battery and the steep bank, will be erected Fort Stag Stake, covering the inferior battery, and forming very advantageous crossing fires with those of the opposite shore; it will be, besides, connected by a covered way with a redoubt to be erected on the extremity of the steep bank, where formerly stood a block house. Mortars will be placed in the covered way joining the fort and redoubt; this last will be defended by six pieces of the largest caliber. These mortars, combined with the defences already designed, will complete the protection necessary for the channel in the narrows; but as it is prudent to calculate all possibilities in cases of such high importance, we will suppose that the enemy should attempt a landing in order to master the right shore's defences. This determines us to propose to occupy by a redoubt the heights of Cherry Hill, connecting this redoubt with Fort Stag Stake, by a double covered way, traced with intelligence, and seizing, by another covered way, an important ground below Fort Stag Stake, which is susceptible to receive a number of men sufficient to oppose any enterprise of the enemy on Staten Island, the object of which might be to possess the defences therein established, or what is not so likely to attack the city and harbor.

Thus, in our opinion, should be ensured the defence of the right shore of the Narrows; the entrenched camp we have mentioned, useless for the present moment, might be of very little expense, and present to the militia of the island a point of rendezvous, which the enemy would not, without danger, leave behind.

* Narrows.

Of all these works, the most urging ones are also the plainest; the block house redoubt Fort Stag Stake, and the intermediate batteries, should be constructed immediately. These first defences would cost but little; and, combined with those established on the opposite shore, might already present a very respectable opposition to the enemy.

Supposing, however, he might succeed in forcing this first passage, he should find new obstacles on approaching Bedloe's Island, situated so as to face the channel, and whose fires might cross, with great advantage, those of Governor's Island, and concur with those of Oyster Island; a new battery should, consequently, be erected on that Island, mounted with six pieces of the largest caliber, and two mortars.

After Bedloe's, and on the same side of the channel, we find a very low Island, (Oyster Island,) which is its proximity to the city, to Bedloe's and Governor's Islands, renders infinitely precious; it will be necessary to place there the same defence as on Bedloe's Island, making use of coast carriages; the right hand shore being protected in this manner nothing will be wanting to its defence.

Considering now the left hand shore, of which there is but one point occupied in the narrows, it will suggest the necessity to bestow the greatest attention in forming a solid protection on Governor's Island, the happy position of which can procure crossing fires with most of the points taken on the right hand shore, being equally distant from Bedloe's and Oyster Islands, and the city, with which it is possible to obtain crossing fires on the entrance of East river, where should, probably, retire all the riches of the harbor, should the coast come to be attacked.

This point will be consequently the object of the nicest attention; it will be occupied by at least twenty pieces of the largest caliber, and four mortars, the whole distributed with cautious knowledge.

All the works to be made in Bedloe's, Oyster Island, and Governor's Island, will be of little cost; the execution of them may be undertaken immediately; they cannot be ordered too soon.

The defence of the channel, established as we have expressed, we think that no fleet should ever undertake to force it; and we are of opinion that there would be no subject of fear on account of the town; this will dispense from seeking to add to the proposed works batteries, connected with the place; the surest effect of similar establishments would be to draw the fire of the ships; and, should the enemy be so far advanced as to beat on them, the city would run the risk of being destroyed; the object of defence would be frustrated, and there is no sacrifice but would seem of no consequence to avoid such a calamity.

It is then in front of the city that we must look for its defence, which seems to be assured by the means of the works designed along the channel; but, should it here remain, yet some fears, which nothing but the importance of the object might justify, we might propose to anchor, ahead betwixt Governor's and Oyster Islands, an unsubmersible floating battery, that might combine for its defence all the advantages of land batteries, such as red hot balls, and other defensive resources. Such batteries would be lasting and of little expense in this country; they appear even the most natural means to be employed for the protection of the United States' harbors. The advantage which these ambulatory forts enjoy, by being able to be removed from one place to another, and to give a good covering to their defenders, should entitle them to a particular preference from a country, abounding in wood, and whose population is not advanced. Such a battery should be armed with ten guns and two mortars, and might also serve as a fixed point for a chain, shutting any portion of the channel starting from Oyster Island. This caution, by straitening the entrance of the harbor, should render more efficacious the means of defence, cumulated on that part of the channel left free for the navigation.

We shall limit there the means of defence we judge convenient to propose for the city and harbor of New York, deeming unnecessary to take greater cautions against ships which, having forced the channel, would attempt to burn the vessels retired in East river. We are too much persuaded of the impossibility that the enemy should ever come so far; and, when we reflect on the risks that same enemy would be exposed to, should, after a check, contrary winds force him to remain a prey to all the means of destruction that might be directed against him, we cannot believe that the city and harbor of New York will ever have any thing to dread from an hostile fleet. We cannot, however, disapprove the idea of many persons, which, considering all the riches of the harbor cumulated in the East river, propose to erect another battery east of the public work, and joining the city so as to have crossing fires over the entrance of the East river with batteries of Governor's Island.

Having thus given a general idea of the means of defence, which seem convenient to a point that ought, undoubtedly, be looked upon as one of the most important in the Union, we will endeavor to collect, in a general table, and at one view, all that we have deemed necessary to undertake, in order to ensure to this harbor the security conveyable to the most magnificent emporium of the universe.

NEW YORK, the 10th of —ber, 1794.

EXCELLENCY:

Being always in expectation of one answer to my two last letters, I see, with great uneasiness, coming the moment at which I must deliver to the commissioners, for the fortifications at New York, my plans and memorials relating to the defence of the harbor. I am in the opinion that it is my duty to submit every thing to your approbation; and, in order that you may more easily explain your idea, and to be better understood, I have prayed the Captain Pray, who has been always busy about these works, to bring to you all my papers. This brave and very intelligent man thinks himself very happy in taking this opportunity to present to you his respects. I have requested the Captain Pray to be here the 20th of this month, the appointed day by the commissioners for the communication of my papers; and I am under the greatest necessity to pray you to send me again every thing but what is relating to West Point; and I will observe to you that, upon the memorial relating to the Fort Clinton, I have made one important addition concerning the objection offered against my project.

It is my duty, Excellency, to remember to you, that I want your approbation for being able to go on upon the model proposed for the floating batteries. You will find in the papers one plan and one memorial upon this important subject, which I recommend to your particular attention.

One memorial, relating to the formation of one body of artillery, for the defence of New York, is also in the papers, and is, perhaps, worthy of your examen.

I work every day, Excellency, so much as possible, for being able to answer to the high commission, and surely to the high commission with which I am honored. I am every day helped by the gentlemen employed with me; and, nevertheless, I see very much to do yet for giving every thing relative to the great project of defence of this harbor. We continue what appears to me the most important; and, as I think you want to have one copy of every general plan, we shall be very busy till the spring, which must begin for our works as early as possible.

If any plan should appear to you more proper to be sent again to you, one copy should be taken immediately, according to your orders, which I hope to receive by the Captain Pray.

I am, with the highest respect, Excellency, your most obedient servant,

VINCENT.

Secretary of War.

FORTIFICATIONS, PHILADELPHIA, AND WILMINGTON, DELAWARE.

Instructions to Peter Charles L'Enfant.

SIR:

In pursuance of the directions of the President of the United States, you are hereby appointed a temporary engineer for the purposes of fortifying the ports of Philadelphia and Wilmington, upon the river Delaware.

You are therefore immediately to proceed in the execution of this business, under the general directions of the Governors respectively of the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware.

The following is an extract of the estimate on which the appropriations of the fortifications have been founded:

For Mud Island and Philadelphia,	-	-	-	$11,913 82
For Wilmington,	-	-	-	3,000 00

The proportions of expense therefore must not be exceeded. But every thing now undertaken must be completed and be considered as the parts of a more general, perfect, and permanent plan, to be hereafter executed; provided the sum now appropriated should prove insufficient, which is highly probable.

It is presumed that the completion of Fort Mifflin, at Mud Island, will be considered as the first object to be undertaken in Pennsylvania. The works to be erected at Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, will also require immediate attention in order to be put in a train of execution.

It will be perceived, by the lowness of the estimates, that the parapets of the works to be erected are in general to be of earth, or, where that cannot be obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with timber and filled in with earth. A parapet, however, formed of tenacious earth, is conceived not only to afford a solid defence, but even to be durable, provided it be properly sloped and sodded inside and out, and sown with a species of grass called knotgrass, so as to bind the sods and earth together.

Your judgment will decide where to have embrasures for your batteries, and where to fire en barbette, and also where to have the common garrison, and where the new carriages to fire en barbette, at present used on the sea coast of France.

You will also direct what part of the works shall be protected by palisades and what by fraizes.

It is conceived to be essential that all batteries which are erected on islands or points of land at a distance from support ought to be protected by redoubts or other enclosed works, and that such redoubts ought to be secured by a block house, where the garrisons, in which ordinary cases will be but small, ought constantly to reside.

In the construction of the redoubts, or enclosed works, they ought in the first instance to be constructed so as to contain a respectable garrison, suppose five hundred men, and casemates ought also to be contemplated in the construction, although they will not now be erected.

It has also been contemplated in the estimates that the magazines should be formed with timber, and five or six feet thick on the roof, so as to resist a heavy shell. This thickness is independent of the earth which may be placed over the timber. These magazines ought to be well ventilated, so as to be entirely free from dampness, and of a size to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon.

The spots at which magazines of this nature should be fixed will require great judgment, so as to combine security against all enemies, either open or subtle, and against common accidents.

A reverberatory furnace, of the best construction, in order to heat balls red hot, must be erected for each battery. These are general ideas, but are not to constrain your own judgment, excepting as to the limitations of the expense, which, as before mentioned, must not be exceeded.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, together with all the combinations and effects dependent thereon, will rest upon your judgment under the directions of the Governors.

All the plans must be accompanied with sections and elevations, so that a complete judgment may be formed thereof, an estimate of the expense must also be formed of each work, and the number and size of the cannon intended must be specified. One copy to be given to the Governor, and one transmitted to this office, to which also you must weekly report your progress.

Your requisitions for labor and materials must be made upon _____, who is appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to account for the sums to be expended at Philadelphia, and upon _____, who is appointed for the same purpose at Wilmington.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 3d day of April, 1794.

SIR:

Much consideration being requisite in combining a fortification, especially when the safety of a capital city is the immediate object, I cannot but wish for time to mature my ideas on the subject; and seeing what grand system of defence the protection of a fort on Mud Island will require, and, independent of which, a stand at that spot can give no kind of security, your opinion being to determine my process, the following notes I conceive necessary to facilitate your judgment of the principle on which to direct my labor.

First, Viewing the situation proposed, I find, that however spacious as the fluid surface appears to be, the breadth of the ship channel is sufficiently narrow, and can be absolutely commanded over by the cannon from Mud Island; that batteries erected at A, under the defence of a fort B, would play right down the stream over the width of the river; that they would batter in front, every vessel coming up, and do more damage, in proportion, to the crowding of sail. No position would be safe to stand by them, and the batteries easily covered from the land side, the garrison being perfectly secure, the fort may be expected to make a steady defence. But that its defence should be effectual in stopping a navy, on this I will observe, that the great object of an expedition rendering of no consequence the loss to which a daring attempt may expose, a fort standing alone may easily be passed; and, as a variety of circumstances would here occasion some additional forts, to render the attempt to force the pass impracticable, it becomes a question, whether some other position in the river may not be found more eligible to make the establishment? But, until I shall have acquired all the information I need to support an opinion in the affirmative, looking upon Mud Island as the spot determined upon, the only method I see of making it answer the object, would be, to take advantage of a bank, to erect a second fort at C, the defence of which would co-operate with those of Mud Island, as may easily be seen on the small sketch of the river to which these notes have reference; that bank only three or four feet under water, easily to be wharfed, no inconvenience being to result to the current with which this bank runs parallel, the measure would prove most beneficial, and the trust which I place in its effects makes me desirous it may be first attempted.

The situation also, D, would be important to secure as well those at G, E, F, where batteries under the cover of Red Bank, and of another post at H, would much annoy a shipping engaged with the forts, as was experienced last war from a battery at F; protecting one another, these batteries would see down the river as far as would the defence of Mud Island, and of the fort C; they would procure a cross fire all the way, but especially above the forts; there it would become such, that no vessel should ever venture through, especially as having first to steer close between the two fires A and C; these different batteries successively to be passed should leave no safe position to repair a damage sustained.

With this, the greatest possible security would be ensured to the city of Philadelphia, and without need of chevaux de frise, an expedient which once might have been commendable, but which, for having in a manner succeeded, should not, however, be thought necessary at this time. In no case whatsoever, I would not advise the sinking of any of them, being well convinced, that more embarrassment would ensue to trading navigation, and more injury be caused by the necessary alteration which it would occasion in the bank and current, than there can be benefit derived from; all considered, every such means are mere expedients and contrivances, subject to accidents in their accomplishment at the moment when danger is near, and they are too precarious a protection for a nation to rest its safety upon, and ought never to be made a consideration in the delineation of a plan for fortification, the grand object of which should be to ensure perfect security, with a little trouble, and with as few military as possible.

All kinds of forts, and most particularly one as intended, ought then to be made capable of self-defence, and should be so situated as to check alone the progress of an enemy, in a country especially where militia being the main body to muster from, much time is required before troops can be assembled and marched. Too much attention cannot be paid, to make all fortifications capable of standing against a vigorous attack, and whenever this cannot be done, it is better not to have any, as by becoming useless they must prove greatly prejudicial.

Guided by these reflections, and considering that the defence of a pass on which the safety of the city of Philadelphia depends, is of an importance, as must make the expense attending the accomplishment of an effectual plan to defend it, a trivial consideration, although, endeavoring to restrain the works, as may be first begun, within the limited sum granted by the Government, I could not, in viewing the situation of Mud Island, confine my labor immediately to the contriving of a figure for a work, the combination of which, I perceived, demanded a previous investigation of the particular circumstances of the opposite shore, and some reflection on the manner of attack possible to be carried against; independent of which consideration, any fortifications as may be erected there, will ever stand a mere mock of defence.

Far remote from the sea as that situation is, it is certain, that no attack will ever be made, unless it is a very determined one; and, viewing the precedent of the manoeuvres of an army by a circuitous march to take possession of Philadelphia, cannot establish a probability of such an attempt being renewed under the present circumstances of the country, all grand operations must now be first directed toward gaining the pass for shipping, which, consequently, would determine an operation against the defence of Mud Island, or of any other situation in the river, on a very different principle than was once carried on there in 1777. Taking, however, that expedition under consideration, the result of my inquiries about, and the observations I have made on the proprieties and inconveniences of a stand so circumstanced, convince me, that in addition to the work above mentioned, as necessary for the defence of the ship channel, others will be wanted to cover and protect these.

The cover of a regular fortified post, to command over Province and Carpenter's Island, will be wanted sufficiently spacious to admit, as the occasion may require, a good garrison, and made strong to support regular approaches and hinder them from being carried directly against the forts on Mud Island, where they may still easily be advanced on the island below, which is but the consolidated part of the same mud bank on which the fort would stand.

The small sketch may show the situation where this post should be fixed, the figuration of the work being left undetermined until a proper survey of the country round has been obtained—whether in the manner of a horn, or crown work, must depend from the manner of the establishment on Mud Island, which it must cover, and by which it ought to be defended.

Some difficulties will be, to continue the work on the island a regular one, the solid part being too narrow to admit of square forts, whose line of defence it would render too short; an inconvenience would also arise from crooked lines, these being always defective, for a situation easily to be surrounded, as half of the circuitous line must inevitably be seen in the flank and rear. Wishing to avoid this inconvenience, and to procure a larger front of fire over the channel, I would determine upon the position of the battery as at A, which will show the advantages of that direction over that of the old forts, the remains of which cannot be any way serviceable but my making use of the materials.

N. B. The defect of that old fort, not only lay in the configuration of its line of defence, which, as General Dupont well observed, are too short for mutual protection, but its situation is altogether so ill judged, as to be enlaided from every point from whence an attack is the most likely—a disadvantage in no manner remedied by the improvement proposed by that officer, who surely did not see the situation with a proper attention, or he must have observed, that no part of the addition which he planned would have been more secure than the old; no work, indeed, would be possible to contrive making the old one serve, which could be made a stand even against a few gun boats in the west channel; necessarily then, rejecting all idea of connecting any new work with the former one, I would establish the forts and batteries back of the wall now standing, making this serve as a cover, until the work is sufficiently advanced to mount the batteries, after which it would be pulled down, making the stone serve the construction of the principal forts.

As to what relates to the construction of the batteries and forts, the island being mostly overflowed and of a soft clay bottom, it will necessitate to some expense to lay on a solid base in logs framed in the manner of a grate under the whole, with a kind of upright framing to receive the platform; observing that, however temporary the object of the batteries now to be made may be, the time of which they may be of use, perhaps distant, may render them then out of repair, and consequently useless, or that being ever so near at hand, a defect in the superstructure being to accelerate their destruction, their object would be unanswered, and the confidence placed in them being disappointed, the sparing of proper materials and of the labor should, in both cases, be dearly repaid by the loss of valuable lives, and the disasters attending a weak resistance.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

SIR:

After all possible exertions on my part, to progress the fortification at and near Mud Island, and however attentive I have been in confining the extent of my operations to the limited sums assigned for, it is with the greatest concern I am to inform you that those means, by proving too small, have long since forced me to relent of the progress; they are at present so far exhausted, that, unless you can procure a sufficiency of supply to continue the work for two months longer, the whole must stop before any part is brought to that state of perfection necessary to be guarded against winter, and answer to some object of defence.

In endeavoring to obviate the consequent injury which I saw must result from leaving what is done in a state still imperfect, and apprehending no new supply could be procured, since last supplementary sum obtained has itself proved much less than what I had been led to expect from General Knox's own promises, I determined upon an expedient step, that of soliciting, through the Governor of Pennsylvania, the necessary assistance from the State. This measure, and the information I gave to a committee of the House at their visit on the island, and at two subsequent meetings on the business, determined a report agreeable to my wish—a sum of six thousand dollars they granted as an advance, leaving the manner of repaying it to the next Legislature to determine upon, and also referring to the same, the consideration of what would be proper to do respecting the cession of the island to the United States. This was the purport of the bill this committee proposed, and, on another part having obtained the concurrence of some of the members the least disposed to favor federal measures, I judged that but little opposition would be made to the bill; in this hope, however, I have been frustrated by the sudden adjournment of the Legislature, who confined their labor to the consideration of the few bills which the Governor, in haste of leaving town with the militia, pointed out as the most essential for them to pass. Left by this disappointment in the same dilemma of difficulties as had induced my application, the prosecution of the business solely now depends on what you can do, and in soliciting you to give me immediate directions, I must beg, before you determine on the arrest of the whole of the operations, that you will consider the consequences, giving a due attention to the particular statement, herein enclosed, of the actual situation of the several parts of the work that is engaged in conformity to order of April 27, and 29th ultimo.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

P. CHARLES L'ENFANT.

P. S. The enclosed statement of the progress of the work on Mud Island, I would beg you would, after perusing it, and when may be convenient, return it to the Board of War, as, in the hurry of business, I have had no time to keep a copy.

Mr. T. Francis, who sent me the sketch of the account, by which there appears, September 29d, a balance in his hands of $1,618 66, wanted immediately to stop all operations. I have requested him to wait until I receive your directions, and hope you will favor me with them as immediately as possible.

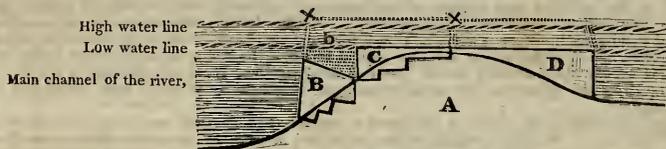

PHILADELPHIA, September 25, 1794.

Statement of the progress made at the several parts of the fortifications, begun at, and near, Mud Island, in the river Delaware, agreeably to order of the 27th, and 29th April last.

Works on the Middle bank east of Mud Island.

After the many contrarieties experienced, both in procuring the necessaries, and in effecting the sounding, and laying of the work in the water; out of two of the several cones and caissons waoss which are to be made the base to erect upon the fort, and which, after being framed together ready to sink, were maliciously set adrift by unknown persons; one portion, which that accident caused to detach from the other, has at last been sunk to its place; but, for want of that support which I intended it should receive from the part cut off from it, has sunk to a greater depth than expected, and this has necessitated the application of more timber, and greater quantity of stones and iron, with the means of which, the work is still only raised level with the low water line, under which it must continue to sink gradually, until it can be fastened to the next pile, now secured from the drift, but waiting to be sunk until a sufficiency of supply of lumber and of stone can be procured, so as to render the operation safe, and admit of its being raised as fast as it will sink, and until it is made steady, and brought level with the first part.

When these two piles are connected together, they will form the base for half of the front of the fort, but as this half lay on the declivity of the bank and toward the main current, it can never be well secured until the other half is completed, as may well be judged of from the small sketch of the section of that work hereafter expressed.

The situation of the part B will show the absolute necessity of sinking immediately the part C, and of fastening both together, raising the whole above the high water line, as expressed by the dotted line - - - else, that, by laying as it does, close to the main current, it may give way under the pressure of floating ice, and slip down into the channel, which cannot be apprehended when raised above high water, the banking of any body of ice all round being in no way dangerous, the deepest part of the frame running parallel with the bank, and with the current.

Works upon Mud Island.

The new grand battery extending towards the main channel, under cover of the wall parapet, is but progressed so far as to have the wharf, which is its foundation, completely raised on an extent of about 700 feet, sunk in a depth of from four to fifteen feet, partly in the mud and partly in the stream current. Behind this a large esplanade is formed over the deep swamp, opposite to the old barracks, filled in to the height of the wharfs, level with the high water mark; which left this part to be raised, all over, to about three feet more, (making allowance for the natural settling of new made ground,) before the parapet can be raised and the battery properly mounted; now, the guns being only laid along side the edge of the wharf to forward its settling.

The next work is the old wall rampart of about 290 yards long. Of that wall, the remains of the old fort, 160 yards, has been banked inside, ready to form a parapet and rampart platforms; the whole about forty-five feet broad and on an average ten feet high, which left this part about seven feet still lower that it ought to be to mount the cannons upon. Adding to this, a portion of a line of intrenchment, which is just beginning, on an extent of about 140 yards, but which is yet one half below the height it is to be. They altogether comprehend all what has been attempted of the plans approved of, for the improvement of the fort on Mud Island, and the construction of the new one intended upon the middle bank.

The manner how the whole has been directed, determining the greatest progress in all the part most difficult to come at, and which would be impossible to attempt at a moment of imminent danger, will show that I have been less anxious to make a show of progress, flattering to the eyes, than eager in bringing forward those parts on which, I consider, the good defence of the place most particularly depends. On another part, I considered, all the parapet I could raise, being made of muddy clay, must, however well rammed down as it is, alter in their shape, in proportion as the whole will settle down, that glacia and level of angles must deface, as long as the watery substance is not fairly expunged, from within, and this being not to be expected, but after the winter has passed over. It therefore becomes economical to delay, until the spring, to sod and slope properly the whole.

Giving this sketch of the situation of the fortifications at, and near, Mud Island, nothing having been attempted but that was of necessity to perform; if, notwithstanding all possible economy, the provision made proves unanswerable; to a proper accomplishment of what is begun, before the bad season comes. I think I need not say any thing more of the circumstances, by which those funds at disposal have proved insufficient, than calling to memory the great inconvenience, under which the operations were conducted, at a place destitute of every comfort for the hands; lay open to all accidents of the season, uncommonly bad in the months of June, July, and August, when extraordinary freshes and storms greatly injure the work and caused an increase of labor which could not have been foreseen nor avoided, having had successively to repair the extensive bank round the Island; to build new sluices; open new drains; and to dig over and over again all ditches; without which the whole Island must have been overflowed; the whole work upset, and the laboring hands, with the garrison, reduced to the most unhappy situation.

PHILADELPHIA, May 16, 1794.

SIR:

Complying with your directions, I repaired to the State of Delaware, and in my way to the Governor, first took a view of the situation at Wilmington.

That place well sheltered, by nature, against a navy, as may come up the river, I found need but of a small battery to have its harbor protected.

Two situations offer for that battery, which may be said to be equally advantageous, if considering only the navigation through Christiana and Brandywine creeks; the one at A, at the confluence of these two canals, the other, lower down at B, rightly at the mouth of the main branch; but as the object of a post, as intended, can only be to guard the merchantmen and store, in the confined harbor of Christiana creek, from insult, the situation B, is the only eligible—its advantage over the other would be, its greatest vicinity to the grand channel of the river, over which the post there, would keep a good look out; while the battery may play over the wide surface truly, not as to stop, but greatly incommode a vessel, which it would necessitate to keep aloof from that shore. This post would be out of the reach of the commanding ground at Wilmington; it would be more independent from that town, and its garrison better trained there to military duty, by having sorties sent out to patrol over the space C C C, over which, whenever a suspected vessel lay in the river, it will be essential to keep a good watch, because it is to be observed, that an attempt to burn the shipping, or plunder the stores, lying at D D D, must be made that way, the navigation through the creek, even if it should be left without a battery, being not safe for such an attempt, as after the alarm is given, the inhabitants mustering behind the bank all along the meander of the creek, would easily prevent the going back of any boats, or armed vessels; this consideration, and that of the particular circumstances of the ground H H H, east of the Brandywine and Christiana creeks, down to the river shore, convincing me of the perfect security of that side, I would view a post erected at A, as absolutely useless. The British, it has been objected, had a redoubt erected there last war, at A, which to some people is conclusive, that that must be the situation; to this it need only be observed, that that redoubt was to close the right of a line of defence from the height, north of the town, all along, and fronting toward the Brandywine, from which side they had to fear, and nothing to apprehend from that, C C C being master of the river, a circumstance which, now to be absolutely the reverse, would necessitate in case the post at A should be insisted upon to extend that post, crossing it over the Christiana creek, and establishing a strong redoubt at F, to master those marshes, partly covering the space C C C, the difficulties of passing which, thought by the vulgar a great security, it is well known of all partisans are the weaker of defence, must always become a mean to favor their design.

The next of my inquiries carried me lower down the river; much had been said to me of the pass at Eagle point, which the Governor of Delaware had been solicited to represent to the Federal Government, as the most eligible place for a fort; and, knowing he had declined making the representation, under expectation I would make it my business on my arrival at Newcastle, I engaged one of the stage sloops; and in company with the proprietors of the land about that point, together with a number of captains of vessels, I proceeded immediately to the sounding of the river, first across the main channel, and coming upon the Pip Ash; a bank forming an island opposite Eagle and Reedy Points, continued the sounding along side of that bank, oft times going across and back again, and reached Reedy Island, thence coming back, sounding close to the main shore, until out of that pass; which the operation proved to have a channel much wider, and more free, than had been imagined; this well satisfied the persons the most desirous of seeing a fort erected there, that it would not answer the object; a single fort at the point surely would not be a defence. Nevertheless, looking upon that situation, with the one opposite, upon the Pip Ash Island, it cannot be questioned but that pass may be well armed, and that proper works erected there would protect the whole river back; there being no other pass but a shallow channel east of the Pip Ash, and running close to it, the width of the river toward Jersey being barren all over. With respect to the self security of the works, on these two points, this would be greater than in any situation I have observed, considering the distance of the Jersey shore would not admit of any battery to be erected, against a fort on the Pip Ash, and that the one at Eagle Point, lying at the end of a long and narrow neck, which requires a circuitous march to take possession of, would be guarded against regular approaches, the undertaking of which would be a tedious and difficult operation.

The perfect security which the protection of that pass would ensure to the whole river, and to the several harbor towns on its shore, being an object fully to compensate the expense of erecting proper works on it, although the means at present inadequate, as they are, to the accomplishment of those temporary works, determined upon, cannot indulge me in the idea that these shall be undertaken at present. I could not but wish to ascertain myself the propriety of that situation, of an importance, in my opinion, not to be lost sight of, when the means of the country will render the undertaking practicable.

Many other observations could be made on the propriety of different situations for look-out forts, on the east and west shore of the Delaware, and where small batteries may greatly distress a navy; as, for instance, at a point opposite Wilmington, close to which the main channel runs, and every large vessel must pass. These means of distressing an enemy in a river, the navigation of which is so liable to be invaded as is that contemplated, can never be too much multiplied; and, adding to those look outs, gun boats, or rowing galleys, I question not but the river would be effectually defended against all small naval expeditions; the facility now, the most contemptible of privateers will find to plunder or lay under ashes those stores and vessels lying at Chester, Marcus Hook, and Newcastle; but places more immediately accessible than is Wilmington, being inviting them to the attempt, I cannot but express my opinion, they ought to have been the first to protect; each of them are most susceptible of being well defended with batteries at the head of wharves prolonging out in the river, and post on the shore; they would become as many defences to the river itself. Newcastle, in particular, should be provided for; not because of its great commercial interest, which I conceive rather limited, owing to the back navigation carrying the country produce another way, but because of its importance, when militarily viewed, that place being an essential point in that grand chain of posts for garrisons, which should be combined together, from the southward to the eastern States, all along the coast, as well as on the back frontiers.

This situation, Newcastle, is most happily circumstanced to be made strong, and to unite all what is requisite, a grand garrison. Many situations across to the Chesapeake head would be proper stands to entrench for detached corps, which would shut up all passage through that neck, whose protection requires also some strong establishment on Sassafras river and at Turkey point, the particular circumstances of which places I could not take upon me to survey, finding these were out of the limits of Delaware; their immediate importance, however, to, and connexion with, the defence for the protection of the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania, should annex them to that district, which would lessen the inconveniency which must necessarily result from carrying on the fortifications in each district, independent of each other, in lieu of determining its situation and force from the consideration of the relation which a spot may have with, and the assistance it may give or receive from, those in other States. A manner of process the only economical and secure in the establishment of fortifications, when intended to defend a grand frontier, and an exclusive sea coast; for which, to adopt a general system, should be first laid down; a proper survey of every situation ought at first to have been made, connecting these in a general map, and determining thereon what nature of fortifications may be necessary, with respect to the population of the States, and the habit and disposition of the people, on whose exertion and support those defences may depend.

Finding that no ground at Wilmington had yet been purchased, and the Governor of that State wishing some time to consider, and determine upon the appointment of a proper person to conduct the work, he understanding that the cannon for the fort proposed, could not immediately be had; no inconvenience being to result from a little delay in beginning it, I agreed with him, that after sending him the result of my observation on the propriety of the situation, I should determine that I should wait for his answer, and his appointment of a day for me to meet with him, and proceed according as may be judged most eligible. Doubting not he will communicate previously with you on the subject, I shall esteem it a favor to obtain your opinion on the propriety of the foregoing observations.

From Major L'Enfant to the Secretary of War, dated Philadelphia, 2d July, 1794.

SIR: The Governor of Delaware's answer to two of my letters, coming into my hands on the very evening after I received your notification of the 30th past, I thought most expedient before I go and meet with him, to answer in writing to his objections, and to the reasons which he gave to cover the motives of the opposition made by the inhabitants of Wilmington, respecting the emplacement I have designated, to fortify upon. The copy of this answer I here enclose to you, for your consideration of the circumstances that determined my choice. The next post will probably bring me the Governor's final determination, and I shall accordingly proceed on as you direct, provided no new difficulties occur, which I greatly apprehend. Major Bush's late communication to me, contains some reflections which have been cast upon me, on a misrepresentation of the motives actuating me, which, I trust, those who know me will consider as insulting as it is unmerited; but this is but an account of the profit of office.

For some time past the work at Mud Island has acquired a pretty close attention, and as we are now on the point of sinking part of the grand wharves, on the middle bank, which is about framing, and staked out in the water, being possibly necessitated to go there at the moment's call, unless a purchase of the ground as shall be determined at Wilmington, is actually effected, so that the work may be set about immediately, my repairing there can be no advancement to the business, and will rather interfere with the more important work of the forts here.

From Major L'Enfant to the Governor of the State of Delaware, dated Philadelphia, 1st July, 1794.

SIR:

It will perhaps be needless for me to enter here more largely than I have done before, on the merit of the situation I have chosen to erect fortifications for the defence of the navigation to Wilmington; since, after what I have already said, the objections made, and the expressions of your letter of the 28th ultimo, most fully convince me, no arguments ever so demonstrative of the error of the opposition I meet with, will persuade contrarily to the determination apparently taken to force the establishment on that situation, suitable to some of the inhabitants of that place, to the hazard of its proving useless, and thereby becoming detrimental to the interest of the United States.

However determined in my choice, as I have been from two important considerations—the immediate security of the navigation to the place, which the law directs—next, that of making the establishment small, as it may be susceptible of serving for the protection of the Delaware shore, I indeed but little expected the difficulties I now encounter, and wishing to evidence the principle actuating me, it becomes necessary I should answer to your objections, with that freedom the candor of my intentions authorize. You say, sir, “the work necessary to be erected where I determined, must be attended with much greater expense.” &c. Without asking how this has been ascertained, but presuming from your own observation, you speak from a computation of the difference of a free labor, which you say the inhabitants are willing to perform, provided the work is erected where they wish it to be, meaning apparently by this, that their assistance cannot be expected where I propose. I must first observe this would have but little weight with me, because the works intended having a permanent object, would better be constructed by proper workmen carrying it on gradually, than to have recourse to those expedients of mustering the citizens at large, which may do well at a moment of immediate necessity; when circumstances may require those works to be made complete. Admitting that what I propose may cause an exceed of expense as you imagine, it may be answered, that by the situation of the work that expense would in a manner prove a saving to the public, for reason of the double use the work would then be, while affording the most effectual defence at the entrance of Christiana creek. The circumstance of the situation you must surely not have attended to. When speaking of the other you say, “that place being fortified will command all of both the creeks, which the lower place won't do, except the very mouth of Christiana.” Is not, sir, that the first entrance of the Brandywine creek? and of all other small branches whose mouths lay far up? and is it not, consequently, that by securing the very mouth of Christiana, I secure all other branches of navigation, the same as by shutting the street door of a house, one may leave the inside door open, without fear of robbery? I mentioned that fixing a post at the mouth of that creek, would make the battery play over the river, &c.; and in your endeavor to lessen that advantage, you observe, “the main ship channel ran far off;” but you do not consider how, in the defence of that channel with galleys, gun boats, or the like, that fort would facilitate the manoeuvres of such vessels—how it would permit their keeping in the river before any naval force, by assuring them shelter and protection, without the bar of the creek, up of which stream in fault of these, such vessels must seek a retreat, with the danger in their way of being destroyed from behind the bank, or at least blockaded in, so as to become absolutely useless.

Another misjudgment of the circumstance of the spot which I propose, is evinced by your apprehension of the ground all round being easy to inundate, “difficult to reinforce with militia in case of alarm or emergency;” “nay” say you, “impossible if an enemy should land below, and cut down the bank, whereby the whole work would be covered with water.” Certainly this must be a mistake, being constant that the best security for all fortified posts is, that facility of laying the country round under water—an expedient which an enemy would rather dread, and endeavor to prevent, than be eager to facilitate, as this would be shutting himself the way to conquest. That by laying all the low ground under water, “would make it difficult and impossible to reinforce or to supply the fort,” is not better founded, seeing evidently that the navigation from the town down, by the facility of the creek, can by no exertions whatever, be impeded, and that the way on the summit of the banks each side of the creek, only made more secure by the marsh being inundated, no army could cut off the communication to the forts under such circumstances as you may suppose.

With respect to salubrity, you object “the situation is remarkably unhealthy.” I might also contend this, observing that the bottom of the meadow, on that side of the creek, is rather more raised than on the other; that it has good springs of water, and a number of habitations close by the bank, whose inhabitants look as healthy as in other places. In short, if we were to listen to the opinion of the concerned on either side, we would have heard that the situation at Wilmington is the most feverish of the two. This can only argue, that, where a jealousy amongst settlers does exist, but little confidence can be placed in their opinion on such subjects. It may, therefore, be wise to conclude, from the nearness of the two places, only separated by a stream 300 yards wide, as also from the sameness of the circumstance of the ground each side, no difference in point of health can exist, such as can argue contrarily to the good reasons I have stated to make the establishment at or near the mouth of the creek, where it may become of some service while at.

The place at the rock a fort can in no manner serve, but as a dead show of defence, as, although that situation sees and commands over both creeks, as you mention small boats may, notwithstanding, pass, stealing away under cover of the bank, unnoticed by the garrison, this, and the consideration that a serious attempt against the mills at Brandywine, or against the shipping in Christiana harbor, cannot reasonably be made through that way, it is to be concluded, that a battery then will only answer for a salute, and to afford an afternoon diversion to the inhabitants of the town. That this should be an object with many, if I may judge from the reasoning which I have heard on the subject, I believe, especially since what you mention of an objection to the fort below, being “its remote situation, which would render it inconvenient to the inhabitants.” For their repairing there I must own I see no frequent necessity, nor indeed conceive the advantage, even in the case of an enemy being near: for a fort, to be answerable to its object, should be made capable of defending itself, without need of external corps of troops to protect and cover it, as you seem to contemplate, by way, I presume, of removing any objections to the commanding heights back of the situation of the rock, saying “it is the business of the militia to guard and defend these heights, which, I make no doubt, they will do against any forces that may attempt.” &c.

I doubtless confide as much as you do in the courage of freemen to defend their rights and privileges; however, I must confess I am apprehensive the efforts of a militia would be fruitless on such a call. Besides, it is to be noticed that none of the works at either place contemplated can protect the town; that, in case of a serious attack, the town must, of necessity, fall the first; and, as the only advantage then which can be expected from this fort is, that, by shutting the navigation of the creek, it would cut off a communication between an enemy possessing the town and the shipping in the river, it needs but a moment of consideration to be convinced, that the only eligible position is at the very mouth of Christiana creek, since being no more in power to place your militia so as to defend the rock, a work of whatever strength, then must fall with the town.

The foregoing being meant to show the propriety of my insisting upon the choice I have made, I trust you will believe I am determined to this from a sense of my duty, for you will doubtless consider, that, although I am to act under your directions, yet the expressions of my instructions being to the following purport: "the choice of the ground, together with all the combinations and effects depending thereon, will rest upon your judgment," I become responsible for the consequences of yielding inconsiderately, or through courtesy, to opinions contrary to those which I entertain.

Proceeding, in all my operations, independent of any influence but that of a warm and sincere wish, by all my might, to promote the general good, while I point out what I truly conceive the only expedient means to secure the main object of general defence, and give immediate security to the place which the law directs, I would sincerely regret to see a party spirit oppose my steps, if by arming the prejudices of an uninformed multitude, it should succeed in raising a jealousy against operations on which depend the peace and the preservation of the blessing of that liberty we so long have contended for.

To conclude, should you still insist on rejecting the situation I propose, for that which the inhabitants of Wilmington wish, in opposition to all the reasoning condemning the measure, it will be necessary you will, by a positive injunction to me to proceed accordingly, remove from me all the responsibility, taking upon yourself the consequences.

Should you, on the contrary, as I hope you will, agree with my choice of the spot near the mouth of Christiana creek, I should wish that measures may be immediately taken to effect the purchase of part of the ground which I caused to be surveyed, extending the lot so as to include the principal, if not the whole, of the rising ground, forming a kind of island in the meadow; the small house, as it stands upon, would serve as a barrack, which would be enclosed in a fortified redoubt, which would cover, with great advantage, the battery on the bank below. From the certified disposition of the proprietor to sell, no difficulties can arise on that score, and as to the expense, this would be greatly compensated by making the house subservient to the purpose of a garrison, and, also, by the saving in raising a parapet out of solid ground, which would not occasion any thing like the expense at places where it would be necessary to bring the dirt from a distance. In the interim of these operations, and merely to convince the inhabitants of Wilmington, I wish, as much as may be consistent with a sense of my duty, to make every thing agreeable to them, I would erect a small battery at the rock, which need not be enclosed but by a palisade, making the small house then serve as a barrack.

FORTIFICATIONS AT BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, AND NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.

Instructions to John Jacob Ulrick Rivardi, acting as temporary Engineer in the service of the United States.

In pursuance of the direction of the President of the United States, you are hereby appointed an engineer, for the purpose of fortifying the ports and harbors hereinafter mentioned, viz. Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, Alexandria and Norfolk, in the State of Virginia.

You are, therefore, immediately to repair to the ports to be fortified, in the said States, respectively, and, in case the Governors should be near any of the said ports, you are to wait upon them and exhibit these instructions; but, if the Governors should be at any considerable distance from your route, you are respectfully to notify them of your appointment, enclose them a copy of these instructions, and inform them that you have repaired to the ports aforesaid, in order to make the necessary surveys and investigations relatively to your mission, which you will submit to their consideration, and take their orders thereon.

As soon as you shall receive their approbation of your plans, you are to construct the works and execute them with all possible despatch.

The following is an extract of the estimate on which the appropriations for the fortifications have been founded; the proportions of expense, therefore, herein stated, for the said ports, must not be exceeded, viz.

BALTIMORE, 28 pieces.

Parapets, embrasures, and platforms for batteries, for 28 pieces,	$2,015.44
A redoubt, with four embrasures,	810.00
Two magazines,	400.00
Block house with barracks,	500.00
Contingencies,	500.00
	$4,225.44

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 2 sergeants, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 24 privates.

NORFOLK, 24 pieces.

Batteries, embrasures, and platforms,	$1,737.52
Redoubt, with embrasures,	810.00
A magazine,	200.00
Block house or barracks,	500.00
Contingencies,	500.00
	$3,737.52

Garrison to consist of 1 subaltern, 2 sergeants, 2 corporals, 2 musicians, 24 privates.

Alexandria was inserted by the Legislature, and not contained in the original estimate, it is, therefore, at present to be fortified with works for twelve pieces.

It will readily be perceived, by the lowness of the estimate, that the parapets of the works intended to be erected are to be of earth, or, where that cannot easily be obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with strong timber, and filled in with such earth as can be had.

It is, however, conceived that, in most cases, earth may be procured, and that a parapet made thereof will not only form a solid defence, but even be durable, if the earth be tenacious and properly sloped and sodded inside and out, and the seed of knotgrass sown so as to bind the sods and earth together.

It is, however, apprehended that the embrasures, made in this manner, would suffer from the explosion of the powder from the cannon, and that, therefore, where the batteries are not en barbette, that the embrasures ought to be framed with joist, and faced with plank, of two inches thick.

Where the batteries are to be erected on points of land, islands, or other places, at a distance from the towns intended to be defended, they ought to be covered or secured by a redoubt, or other enclosed work, in which the garrison should reside constantly, either in a barrack or a strong block house, as shall be judged most expedient. But, in general, as the garrisons will be weak in numbers, a block house mounting one or two small pieces of cannon in its upper story will be more secure, and, therefore, to be preferred. These, however, ought not to be much, if any, exposed to the fire of heavy cannon. A block house will not contain more than fifty men; if the garrison, therefore, should be enlarged, tents must be used.

The redoubts, in general, ought to be of a size to contain five hundred men, so as to resist a sudden enterprise of an enemy, and perhaps the idea ought to be embraced, in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates, to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed at present to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and caulked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have these magazines properly ventilated and free from dampness; they are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy, either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will, also, direct what parts of your works shall be protected by friezes, and what by palisadoes, or whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barquette, with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries, they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures—the batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, with all the combinations and works depending thereon, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governors.

It has not been intended, by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be executed. Outlines, only, have been given to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

Some person, in whose ingenuity and industry confidence can be placed, will be appointed, at each of the said ports, to superintend the actual execution of the works, according to your directions. Arrangements will also be made by him, or some other person, to obtain the necessary workmen, implements, and materials, which will be required in this business; but every thing must be previously estimated and calculated by you.

Although the business, herein entrusted to your charge, is, in itself, of a highly honorable nature, and strongly evincive of the confidence of the President of the United States, and which would, probably, enhance your reputation, yet it is explicitly to be understood by you that the employment is only temporary, and not conferring or involving any military rank whatever.

For a compensation for your services and personal expenses, you will be allowed and paid at the rate of four dollars per day, while you shall be employed. For all reasonable extra expenses, such as necessary boat hire, and persons to assist in your surveys, you will be allowed; but for these you must keep regular accounts and take receipts.

You are to deliver to the Governors copies of all your plans, surveys, soundings, &c., and also transmit copies of the same to this office. You are also to make a weekly report to this office of your proceedings. I have issued my warrant, in your favor, for two hundred and fifty dollars, as an advance on account of your compensation and personal expenses.

As it is conceived that the case of Norfolk is the most pressing, you will stay no longer in Baltimore than is necessary to inform the Governor, mark out the works, and leave the execution for the present to Captain Stricker, or some other person whom the Governor may appoint for that purpose.

You will please to give every necessary direction or advice relatively to the mounting of the cannon at those places. I have written to Captain Stricker at Baltimore, and the Governor will appoint some person for Norfolk. Colonel Fitzgerald, of Alexandria, may have the superintendance of mounting the cannon at that place. A reverberatory furnace, for hot balls, must be erected for each battery.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this twenty-eighth day of March, 1794.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Copy of a Letter from J. J. U. Rivardi to the Secretary of War, dated

BALTIMORE, April 13, 1794.

SIR:

I had the honor to receive, yesterday night, your letter of the 11th instant. I hasten to answer it, and to communicate to you my plans for the fortifications of Baltimore; they were drawn in the greatest hurry, but are sufficiently exact to convey a good idea of the spot, its advantages, and its defences.

The point of land represented in the small map, accompanying the plan, is about three miles from town to its extremity, where the old fortifications are placed; the branch of river, which extends itself to Baltimore, and forms the harbor, has hardly one hundred and twenty perches breadth at the entrance, where there was a chain, during the last war, as is marked in the map; the points, marked A B, indicate the opening left for the passage of vessels; the water is deep enough there to admit a frigate. There are two banks, expressed by dotted lines, which render it impossible to any vessel of some burthen to sail in any other direction but that dotted on the map; a direction which presents the broadside to the front of the lower battery.

You will please to observe, that every work, which I propose, is expressed in the paper with yellow color; there are three parts to be attended to in the works exhibited in the plan, viz: the lower battery, A, B, C, the upper battery D, E, F, and the star fort G.

The lower battery's greatest defect, in point of construction, is, that a vessel, after having passed the upper reef, can with ease pour its broadside in the side of the guns; this enfilade is prevented by raising the epaulement, 1, 2, 3, which affords, likewise, sufficient room to pursue, with a sure fire, a vessel which should have succeeded in passing; whereas the battery, in its present situation, must be abandoned, as soon as a vessel, even of a few guns, passes the point. The salient angle B, is totally undermined by the water, and partly fallen down, in such a manner that, without having recourse to an expensive pilotis, there is no possibility to do any thing except to bring the line, B, C, back to 4, 5, and B, 4, to 5, 6; by that method the direction of the fire is not altered, and there is still space enough for the free management of the artillery; the height I, covers the battery on that side, and the ground round it is so commanded by the upper works, that the enemy could derive no advantage from it. That lower battery can contain twenty guns, whereas there were only eleven formerly, by a bad idea that it was better to have more in the upper works. I think it will be indispensable to have a beam of two feet to the battery even if the embrasures were faced with timber or saucissons. The communication from the lower to the upper works, was from D to H, but it has been destroyed by some persons who transformed the whole of the spot, together with the ground intended for the powder magazine, into a deep pit, by digging for red ochre. I propose, therefore, to bring the whole of it to a gentle slope, in which it will be easy to cut a road for the cannon, the lower battery will then be commanded by the redoubts, which formerly could not fire a single bullet into it.

The upper battery commands the lower one very imperfectly; being too near of it, considering its height and the necessary thickness of the breastwork, it will be necessary to take away a good deal of its ascent, otherwise, the epaulements, indispensable for its protection, would be of an enormous and very expensive elevation. Six guns can be conveyed to the lower battery, as five pieces in embrasures, and three or four on frame carriages, will be quite sufficient, the latter to be on the line D, E, and the embrasures as marked in the plan; that upper battery had the same fault of the lower one, viz: to have its rear completely open from the town side, so that a vessel, in intelligence with the enemy, would silence the whole of the guns, after having sailed down the river as far as the point O. In general, a small body of men, landing in boats any where on the western side of the point, might with ease, in the present state of things, penetrate wherever they should think proper, and spike the guns.

The only and the cheapest method I could contrive to secure the whole of the works, and to establish mutual defence, is to continue the epaulement, D, in E; then to project a line, E, F, terminated by the redans, F, G, H; by that method we obtain a well directed cross-fire on the land side, the defence of the river is increased of the flank, F, G, the upper battery is sheltered, and we obtain a commodious space, well covered, for the barracks and magazines; the ditch running before the breastwork, E, F, G, H, communicates with that of the redoubt, drains the ground, and forms a barrier round the works.

The Star fort never was entirely finished, and the greatest part of the ditch is filled up with the earth of the parapets; that kind of redoubt, always bad in itself, (the fires being oblique, and the salient, as well as the entrant angles, indefensible) is rendered still more so, the perpendicular of construction being one-fourth, instead of one-third of the side of the polygon; the only method by which it is possible to render the place able of a good defence, is to construct the two small bastions, J and K, in small pieces, en barbette, on travelling carriages, would defend, by their fire, the whole breadth of the point; all the entrant and salliant angles, but two, would be perfectly flanked; a powder magazine could be constructed in the bastion K, as it is the driest place in the whole point, the platform itself serving as a bomb proof. I am sorry the mail, which closes to night, forces me to be more laconic than I should be on that head, but the inspection of the plan will supply any further explanation.

There ought to be, on the opposite shore and close to the chain, a small tete de pont, or, what would be better, a square redoubt, to prevent any boat from destroying the chain in the night. I would have it slightly constructed, and to hold only a couple of small four pounders, that the enemy could make no use of it against the lower battery.

I think it would be highly necessary to have immediately a couple of carriages made, if it was only to give the pieces examined and tried, which I would like to see done before I go. I shall, with the greatest pleasure, give every necessary direction on that head, as soon as I have your positive orders, and shall likewise, in a few days, write down what carriages should be requisite for the different works.

It is evident that the sum allowed by the Government, is entirely insufficient, even to repair the old works, and to erect the necessary buildings, platforms, carriages, &c.; but I have been assured, that the militia will turn out, and give all possible assistance. The sum above mentioned will then be sufficient for materials, carpenters' work, &c. I shall want 1,280 feet solid timber, for the facing of some part of the works, at one shilling a foot; 1,400 palisadoes to freize and palisade the berm and ditch of those two sides of the redoubts which are not flanked, besides the necessary timber for facing the embrasures and covering the platforms; much will be done by the citizens of Maryland. General Williams is absent, and is in such a bad state of health, that he is not expected to return. Lieutenant Dodge seems to be an active man, and well calculated to forward the execution of the business; but I wish a man, understanding the geometrical part of the business, could be now and then consulted during my absence. There is one Mr. François Gardy, who is perfectly competent to that business, and who, with very little encouragement, would attend when it would be necessary. I have sent to-day my plans to the Governor, with all the necessary explanations, and shall have the honor of communicating to you his answer as soon as I receive it. I imagine the best method will be, to begin by the barracks, to go on then with the lower battery, and to proceed in the order the importance of the works will dictate. I shall repair to Norfolk as soon as I am at liberty to go. I do not know even if it would not be better to sail there first, as in twenty-four hours I could easily perform that journey by water, and when I should be ready for plans I could then go to Alexandria.

Please to inform me how many guns you intend to send down to this place, and what calibre, and likewise what quantity of ammunition. Mr. Dodge mentioned to me likewise, that he did not know yet when he could receive the funds for the purchase of materials. I crave again indulgence on account of this very neglected letter; my hurry, and my quality of a foreigner, will, I hope, be sufficient apologies to entitle me to it.

Copy of a letter from J. J. U. Rivardi, to the Secretary of War, dated

BALTIMORE, April 20, 1794.

SIR: Having received two days ago letters of the Governor of Maryland, expressing his full satisfaction of the plans which I proposed, I drew immediately the lines on the ground, and prepared drawings and sections on a large scale, for the superintendent of the works; I think, therefore, that nothing can delay either their execution, or my journey to Norfolk, for which place I set off to-morrow by the packet. I shall take the liberty now to state to you the demand for tools and materials which I delivered to Lieutenant Dodge, viz:

For the barracks.—A frame forty feet by sixteen, five thousand feet of one inch plank, one thousand feet one inch and one quarter ditto, four thousand shingles, nails, and the necessary hinges, window frames, &c.

For workmen's tools.—One hundred shovels, thirty pick-axes, thirty-six pickets, seventy wheel barrows, a hundred fathom line.

Workmen.—Six workmen for the barracks, and six journeymen for the fortifications. I signed that first demand the 15th April, 1794.

The second demand is for two gins, with their blocks and falls; for one crowsbar; and for an addition of six workmen. It is signed the 19th of April, 1794.

I gave, besides, an estimate of the necessary materials for platforms, embrasures, &c. as follows:

For 32 platforms, requiring, each, 125 feet of oak timber, one foot square, and 261 feet of oak plank, three inches and a half thick. Squared oak, 4,000 feet; plank, 8,352 feet.

For 28 embrasures, each wanting 166 feet of two inch plank, 4,648 feet.

For the guns. Eleven garrison carriages for 18 pounders; four garrison carriages for 12 pounders; six travelling carriages for 12 pounders, and two after trains. One travelling carriage for a 6 pounder, if it bears trial.

I gave the necessary directions for the carriages, and Mr. Dodge will contract for the wood necessary to their construction, as they will then be much cheaper than the pattern which I had made here. I saw one eighteen pounder mounted yesterday, and showed, myself, how to try it. The company of artillery of the town offered their services for trying all the other pieces in the same manner. In general, it seems that the citizens are disposed to give every possible assistance; so that I hope the whole plan will be executed for the sum allowed by the Government. I directed the superintendent to proceed immediately with the lower battery, as the most important, and to mount the cannon, as the platforms and parapets are ready for their reception. The first letter I shall have the honor to write to you, will be dated at Norfolk. I beg you to depend upon my diligence, and believe me to be, with the utmost respect.

Copy of a letter from Major Rivardi to the President of the United States.

NORFOLK, 6th May, 1794.

SIR: I take the liberty, for the first time, to address your Excellency concerning the difficulties which I meet, in the performance of the task you did me the honor to entrust me with. I found, in Baltimore, the situation so advantageous, the soil so proper for fortification, and the zeal of the inhabitants so favorable to my purpose, that, after having given the necessary plans, I left the place with strong hopes that the works should be executed for the sums allowed by Government for that purpose.

At my arrival here, I found an extensive coast, requiring multiplied points of defence; a soil, loose, without the least adhesive quality; the people, though disposed to assist with all their power, much less numerous than at Baltimore; and I compared, with great concern, the sums allowed for the latter place and Norfolk.

I tried the ground, and find it is unavoidable to support it with an interior revetment of bricks or fascines. I should prefer the first as durable, particularly as the thickness of the ground before it will prevent any ball from penetrating deep enough to endanger the soldiers fighting behind; twelve hundred dollars would very likely be sufficient to obtain that end.

Were it on a business in which the safety of the country and my honor should not be interested, I should say that it is possible to regulate the works according to the given means; but, in the present case, I should highly blame myself if any thing was left undone, so as to afford an excuse for a bad defence hereafter, or an occasion to accuse me of ignorance or neglect.

Since my arrival, public money has been expended only for the purchasing of materials and tools, the labor being done almost entirely by the public. Governor Lee's exertions and indefatigability have removed almost every obstacle which I undoubtedly should have experienced had he not been here as soon as myself. I crave your Excellency's consideration on that subject, and can assure that nothing shall be done but what will be strictly necessary.

J. J. U. RIVARDI.

Copy of a letter from Major Rivardi to the Secretary of War.

NORFOLK, June 24, 1794.

SIR:

My occupations, since I had the honor to write to you last, have been so numerous, that it was impossible for me to send the plans which accompany this letter sooner. I hope you will excuse their not being followed immediately by a chart of Elizabeth river, and by that of Craney Island. Having no other instrument but a plain surveying compass, without telescopes, I am under the necessity of multiplying my operations ad infinitum, and very often to omit minute details which would nevertheless be useful in a map that is to be consulted for marches, &c. Should it be possible to send me a theodolite, I would consider it as a very particular favor.

The two plans which I have the honor to submit to your inspection will lose much by not being accompanied by a map to show their exact situation and distances, together with the direction of the channel in its whole extent. I shall, however, try to explain the matter as much as it is possible, and in a fortnight I hope to remedy what should remain obscure by sending the necessary plans and a chart.

Fort Nelson is situated on a small point of land, projecting from Portsmouth side, in Elizabeth river, nearly opposite Norfolk, and within point blank shot of it. It commands the whole of the harbor, as well as its entrance. The letters in red, abcd efgh i, show the ancient lines of Fort Nelson, (the magistrate only is traced, and the following were the principal faults of construction):

1st. The line cd, afforded to the pieces mounted there, a direction out of the mid-channel, as it appears by the inspection of the dotted line, ll, whereas, the present direction mn, from the new line CD, co-operates effectually with the battery A B. To obtain that direction, I was obliged to construct the flank B C, which covers the face of the opposite bastion. The said flank would have been greater if I had not been forced to consult the line of the highest tide, which sometimes raises to the counterscarp.

2d. The line ef was not flanked.

3d. The redans efg, offered too acute a salient angle, the side fg, was both too short and too oblique to flank the line gh.

4th. The side hi, makes too obtuse an angle with ia, to flank it.

5th. The line ab was without any defence whatever.

6th. The whole terreplein of the fort was so very high above the level of the sea, that no part of the interior of the fort was safe at a very short distance of the breast work. The foundation of the windmill, which served as a powder magazine, was entirely open to the shot. I was obliged to sink the whole terreplein considerably; the four large traverses serve now as a very good shelter, and even as an entrenchment to secure a retreat. They had another advantage, that of employing a vast deal of ground, which should otherwise have been removed. There is not a part of the terreplein, at the present time, where the men will not be perfectly covered by the works.

Having examined the faults of the former fort, I shall beg leave to state the objections which, at first sight, could be made to the present construction:

1st. A B, C D, and I H, are the only flanked sides towards the river; the lines DE, EF, FG, GH, not deriving the least defence from each other.

2d. The entrant angle G, might have been omitted, as well as the salient angle E.

Without entering into every reason which led me to prefer that form, I shall only observe, as for the first objection, that, from C to F, the best form to give to a battery, would have been a part of a circle, or an arc of about 120 degrees; but as a corbe can never be flanked, I preferred making the angles D and E; and, in order to cover them, I constructed a kind of caponiere, leading through the ditch to a place d'armes, which flanked sufficiently these lines; for it is plain that this is the last place where a landing, in order to form an attack, would be attempted. D is also covered by the flank a v, E by the caponiere 4, 5, 6.

With respect to the angle G, it is so very obtuse, that it little differs from a straight line, which could not have been obtained without diminishing the side F E, and carrying H I more inwards, as the ground before G is too low to admit of its being brought forward. In short, in fortification of the works fronting a river which offers no landing but out of gun shot, the chief intention of the lines towards the water must be entirely directed towards rendering the navigation as difficult as possible, disposing the guns in such manner as to bear upon the mid-channel through its whole extent; the mutual defence of flanks and sides is a rule from which an engineer may then depart, though he never can do it when he constructs towards the land side. The batteries A B C D, afford an excellent cross-fire with the batteries J K and A B of Fort Norfolk; the guns from D in F bear then upon the vessels nearly at the distance of a musket shot.

Towards the land, or Portsmouth side, the entrant angles S T V, N M L, will appear at first a singular innovation, but the advantages derived from it being considered, they will, I hope, be considered as an useful one. If two simple bastions had been constructed, the faces towards the water could not have been flanked, and the shoulder, or angle de l'épaule, would either have become too acute, or the flanked angle would have fallen in B, which would have been intolerable. The only side in the whole fort, which is not immediately flanked, is L K, where the sallie is managed. As it is impossible, however, to attack it in front, without passing under the fire of the flank R Q, and of the lines N M, M L, it is sufficiently protected.

With regard to Fort Norfolk, the ground is so advantageously situated to command the channel, that the front, J K A B C D E was almost dictated. The brisure of the courtine, which would be a fault in land fortification, became unavoidable, as by that the two batteries command the two principal points, viz: A B has its direction towards the western branch, where the British troops landed last war, and co-operates as a middle point with the fort of Craney Island, and that of Portsmouth; B C fires along the channel, in front of Craney island—the disadvantage arising from that construction is, that the faces J K, D E, being parallel to A B, B C, they are not protected by the flanks of the horn work, a consideration which must yield to the advantage procured by being able to direct two guns more on the points just mentioned, which would not have been the case, if the courtine had been straight; besides, those faces cannot be attacked in front; and if the enemy wanted to turn the line D E, he would have to pass under the fire of a wing of a flank of the bastion F. I shall only add, that all the ground round the fort is perfectly level, as far as musket shot, then it is surrounded by woods, where an enemy could be stopped, either by abattis, or by small parties. No gun could be brought, without great trouble, to annoy the land defences, and they are sufficient to afford two hundred men a very gallant defence against eight times that number. By the time I have finished the plans concerning Craney island, the chart of the river will be ready likewise; and I hope that you will think, with Governor Lee, that it would have been difficult to find a better method of defence.

Whatever delays there may be in the completion of my plans on the paper, you may rest assured, sir, that there are none in their execution on the ground, as far as our means will allow it. I am forced to supersend every thing myself, in order to avoid errors, for I can employ nobody who is acquainted with the subject, except Mr. Courty, who does not speak a word of English.

I wrote to Mr. Vermonet, and received no answer. I am also only informed, very imperfectly, of the proceedings of Mr. Dodge, at Baltimore. I am much afraid that he has too much confidence in his abilities, and that there will be a deviation from my plans; for although I gave him very plain instructions, I expected he should ask for further explanations and directions as he went on with his works.

The front J K A B C D E is much advanced at Fort Norfolk. The Governor of the State presses much to see a beginning at Craney island, and I should have complied already, but for the great scarcity of hands. However, as Fort Nelson is greatly advanced, I will be able, in three days, to break ground there. I shall have the honor to write to you in a few days likewise, concerning the mounting of the guns, and several other objects, regarding the necessary implements, magazines, &c.

J. J. ULRICK RIVARDI.

Copy of a letter from Major Rivardi to the Secretary of War.

NORFOLK, July 6, 1794.

SIR:

I hope you will have received the plans and letters which I have had the honor to send to you the 24th June last. The bad weather, the deficiency of cash, and the circumstance, fatal to the progress of our works, that all the people are engaged at their crops, have put a temporary slowness in every thing here. I therefore employed that time in visiting the country, taking the necessary surveys, and drawing the map of Elizabeth's river, which I join to this letter. It is a very accurate one with respect to the distances, creeks, soundings, and windings of the river. The roads are likewise carefully marked, and I lament only that it is not drawn with more neatness; my various occupations, and the hurry in which I did it, will, I hope, be a title to your indulgence. The scale I made use of, is of a mile and a half, viz: 7,920 feet English measure; it is subdivided in 108 chains, each 36 $\frac{2}{3}$ feet.

If I receive the theodolite which I had the honor to mention in my last, I will then be able to supply your office with a map, including Cape Henry, and the mouths of all the different rivers, James, Nansemond, &c. That map would be very useful to establish signals, communications, &c. Next week I shall have the honor, sir, to send you a plan of the redoubt to be erected at Craney island, a spot of too much importance to be neglected, as all the vessels are forced to come under point blank shot of it, as you may see by the chart.

I wish you would have the goodness to inform me in what manner you intend to have the furnaces for heating the shot constructed. The adjective reverberatory, annexed in my instructions, makes me think that you mean to employ a new construction which I am ignorant of; but if the furnaces, as made use of four years ago in Germany and in France will be sufficient, I can give the necessary directions, even with some improvements made (in the chapel leading the shot on the gridiron) by the Russians in the last war.

I have been forced, for the necessary surveys, to a number of extraordinary expenses. The $200 which I received at Philadelphia for that object, have been expended some time; and as some journeys will, perhaps, be necessary, either to Baltimore or to Alexandria, I shall take the liberty to beg you to send me some fresh supply for extraordinary expenses, when you have the goodness to forward me the advance of the sum allowed for my compensation, which I shall be in want of by the end of this month.

Here I enclose a return of the laborers employed at the fortifications for a fortnight. It will show you, sir, what difficulties this scarcity of hands must subject us to. Much is promised for the beginning of next month. Much, indeed, is necessary, in order to have the forts completed this summer, which I hope will be the case.

I have been honored by no letter of yours since the 16th ultimo. I hope it is not a mark of dissatisfaction, as I never shall give (as much as it will lay in my power) the smallest occasion to doubt my exactitude and my activity in the performance of the business entrusted to me.

J. J. U. RIVARDI.

P. S. The guns from Elk are arrived safely.

Copy of a letter from Major Rivardi to the Secretary of War.

NORFOLK, July 20, 1794.

SIR:

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 7th instant. It afforded me a great pleasure, as you were so good as to express your satisfaction of my conduct. Permit me to embrace this occasion to assure you once more, that whatever may occasion delays in the business I am intrusted with, it will never arise from my want of activity or attention, and that the pleasure of performing my task, like a man of honor, will be such, that, in spite of difficulties, I never shall renounce it.

Here I have a great many obstacles to surmount, which I never could have foreseen. I hope you will excuse me if I enter into some particulars on that head; the anxious desire which I feel to see the fortifications complete, will be my apology, and I never should trouble you with any complaints, if I personally only was suffering, some difficulties arising from others in the performance of my duty.

At my arrival here, the novelty of the object of my voyage, the presence of Governor Lee, and the good dispositions of some leading men, encouraged me to hope that a great deal could be done, by means of contributions and voluntary assistance, which, from the smallness of the sums allowed by Government, would have been impracticable otherwise. The first letters I had the honor of writing to you, sir, expressed that expectation which, I am very sorry now to inform you, has been much too sanguine; for I thought that, in a small community, where public welfare ought to be the chief aim of every individual, no jealousy, no parties, could be found. I do not think, however, that there exists, any where else, such ridiculous divisions as here. The inhabitants of Portsmouth expected all the means should be employed in protecting their side, and refuse their assistance at Fort Norfolk. The inhabitants at Norfolk, not to be behind hand, refuse theirs at Portsmouth, and will not even do any thing on this side of the river, if every one does not work in turn. The consequences are obvious: money must purchase all the labor, and, even then, it is sometimes impossible to get more than thirty or forty hands. This is not the only inconvenience to be complained of. There is a large number of dissatisfied men who object altogether to fortification, from the same principle for which they object to every measure of Government. Some would rather bush fight, (as they call it) in case of a war, and the fact is, I fancy, that they had rather not fight at all. I drop this disagreeable subject: the only thing is to be deaf, and do what the safety of the country requires.

The sum allowed for this place was 3,737 dollars, to which adding the 1,200 that I requested in addition, we will have 4,937 dollars, 2,700 of which only have been sent. This sum has brought us so forward that the balance, or a very few hundred dollars more, will be enough. For the mounting of the cannon, Mr. Bedinger informs me you have sent 1,500 dollars, which are not yet arrived.

By the plans which I had the honor of transmitting to you, you will see, sir, that, instead of 24 guns, there will be at least 30, employed for the defence of Elizabeth river, which alone would require some addition of money, allowing even that the estimate which I have in my instructions is an accurate or sufficient one. I expect Governor Lee every day; his presence, I hope, and example, will rouse a little the sleeping patriotism of the people here; then I shall communicate immediately to you what is to be expected, and what further ought to be done. In the mean time, money is much wanted here, and we have suffered a little from the delay of the 1,500 dollars, which you ordered to be sent here. If I dare to mix my private concerns with the public ones, I should beg leave to tell you that a delay of the sum I requested in my last would likewise bring me into difficulties.

I present hereby to your inspection the plan of defence of Craney Island. Should Point Comfort be fortified, the battery of seven guns (drawn in the margin, fig. 2d.) would be sufficient, even without the outworks which I painted yellow on purpose; but, if the Government does not think proper to go to that expense, the same battery might do, with the addition of the outworks; but, in case there was a sufficiency of means, I would prefer the fort F. I, as that place is very important from its nearness to the channel. I have sent a plan similar to the enclosed to Governor Lee, and I shall wait for his directions before I proceed any further.

J. J. U. RIVARDI.

Extract of a letter from Major Rivardi to the Secretary of War, dated Norfolk, December 9, 1794.

SIR:

"Since I had the honor of writing to you last, I mounted all the guns at Fort Norfolk, and unmasked, in a great measure, the battery, which is now completely turfed and in perfect order. The two forts would be now in a state of defence on the river side, had I not been disappointed by those who raise the carriages, which I so often mentioned in my letters. It is owing to that delay that Fort Nelson has no guns mounted toward the entrance of the harbor; that business, however, can be done in one day.

"The barracks are already framed, and provided some money for that purpose is soon forwarded, they will shortly be fit for the reception of the soldiers.

"Captain Blackburne being returned here, I shall leave it to him to inform you of the situation of his men.

"The weather has been, and continues to be, very favorable; as it is probable, however, that a change will take place, I shall henceforward employ the workmen at the ditch, a task which is not liable to accidents from the frost."

From Samuel Dodge, Agent for procuring materials, &c. for the fortifications at Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, July 8, 1794.

SIR:

The timber and plank, for the platforms, is all landed at the fort, with timber for eleven garrison and seven travelling carriages, ordered by the engineer, exclusive of one carriage for an eighteen, and four for twelve pound ordnance, which the engineer contracted for at fifty dollars per piece.

The carriage for the eighteen pounder, with the implements, I have paid for by the order of the engineer; since rendered useless, with one of the carriages for a twelve pounder, by the bursting of two guns. The travelling carriages will be eighty dollars per piece; but shall have neither one nor the other made until further orders from your Excellency, as no money has been placed in my hands for that purpose.

Your Excellency's instructions directs that I should forward you an abstract of the articles for which the first moiety of the sum contemplated was disbursed, which I should have done, but the second was wanted for the payment of the timber and plank, with the plank for the carriages; the amount being nearly that of the first moiety.

I have received eight carriages, directed to my care by Mr. Samuel Hodgdon, but am apprehensive that there must be a mistake, as they are ship carriages, being entirely too low. The works are constructed for carriages three feet ten inches high; and I expect the extra expense of laying a platform will be more than the price of a ship carriage.

It is impossible for me to give your Excellency an accurate statement of the proportion of the work, as the whole of the lower battery, with part of the upper line, has been raised by the citizens; and no account kept of the different days' works. The engineer ordered me twelve men, who have beaten the whole, and sodded about two-thirds of the lower battery, when finished, and the platforms laid, will be equal to one half of the plan.

Your Excellency will please to observe that the water battery is about six hundred feet in length, and twenty feet through, with embrasures for twenty-four pieces of ordnance.

It is with no small degree of pain that I inform your Excellency that the works, for want of a guard, are much injured by the citizens trampling on it; they have torn it to pieces in a most shameful manner; the cattle, likewise, do great damage to the sods.

I should be glad to know what were the wages given at the fortifications in Pennsylvania; I have hitherto got men for three-fourths of a dollar, but from Saturday night I shall give one dollar or lose the men.

SAMUEL DODGE.

BALTIMORE, July 10, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to forward your Excellency, by this post, the statement mentioned in my letter of the 8th instant, which is as follows, to wit:

Timber, plank, and shingles, for the barracks,	-	-	-	$150 33
124 Shovels,	-	-	-	110 08
11 Casks of powder,	-	-	-	95 27
Drayage,	-	-	-	50
2 Log lines to lay out the works,	-	-	-	2 00
1 Gun carriage, with the implements,	-	-	-	62 00
Plank for a sewer to the spring,	-	-	-	8 95
Shaving 4,000 shingles,	-	-	-	9 56
39 Picks, 6 axes, 1 crowbar, and spikes for the sewer and bridge,	-	-	-	46 86
Plank for stakes to lay out the works,	-	-	-	1 96
20 Wheel-barrows,	-	-	-	80 00
Nails for the barracks,	-	-	-	18 11
25 Bushels lime for the barracks,	-	-	-	8 33
1 Set of gin blocks,	-	-	-	6 33
1 Fall for ditto,	-	-	-	7 40
Locks, bolts, &c. for the barracks,	-	-	-	8 87
Timber and plank for the bridge,	-	-	-	31 37
One month's wages for two barge men attending on the fort,	-	-	-	36 00
Timber and plank for the platforms, with plank for the carriages,	-	-	-	1,499 78
175½ days' work of the artificers,	-	-	-	244 91
727½ days' work of the laborers,	-	-	-	569 43½
				$2,998 04½

I have received from the United States $3,300. The remaining fifteen carriages I understand arrived last night in town; shall have them, with the eight that arrived some time since, brought to the fort. There has none of the guns yet arrived.

I have the honor, &c.

SAMUEL DODGE.

BALTIMORE, September 14, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that the lower work of the fortification, at this place, is complete to laying the platforms; three of them are made and one nearly laid. I did expect that the work would have been further advanced than it is, but the sickness and the loss of number of my men has prevented it. I have likewise been confined these six days, by which means the work has been greatly retarded. I am under the necessity of making and laying the platforms with the laborers, as no consideration can induce carpenters to work at the fort.

The moneys that have been sent on is expended, to about seventy dollars thirty cents, or thereabout, of which I have to pay for tools, &c. for laying the platforms.

I should have notified your Excellency of the situation of the fortification, and the expenditures, before this, but my indisposition has been such as rendered it out of my power. The platforms, from the largeness of the timber, and the form they are directed to be made, require a great deal of labor both in putting together and laying.

I have the earth to raise very much, and that requires much ramming to make it sufficient to stand the firing of the guns. The number of men I have at present are fourteen; I was directed by the engineer to have eighteen, but it is almost impossible to get laborers.

SAMUEL DODGE.

FORTIFICATIONS AT ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND, AND ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.

Instructions to John Vermonnet.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 12, 1794.

SIR: Some time since I had the honor of receiving a letter from you, expressive of your desire of being employed as an engineer in the service of the United States.

I should have been happy, had an earlier opportunity occurred for your employment; but an offer is now made to you, to direct the works at Alexandria and Annapolis, provided the law, which is now under consideration, should pass relatively to the latter place.

Alexandria has been previously assigned to Mr. Rivardi; and, therefore, in case you accept the offer now made, you will, in case of his coming to Alexandria, work under his orders, and in concurrence with them. Annapolis will be assigned to you entirely; although, if he should have time, it would not be amiss to take his judgment thereon.

Alexandria will claim your immediate attention. The President of the United States, who is well acquainted with the river Potomac, conceives that a certain bluff of land, on the Maryland side, near Mr. Digges's, (the point formed by the Eastern Branch and the Potomac,) would be a proper situation for the fortification to be erected. You will probably be able to obtain maps of the river at Alexandria.

The sum to be expended for the works to defend Alexandria, is not to exceed three thousand dollars, exclusively of the expense of the cannon. The labor, implements, and materials, will be obtained by Col. Fitzgerald.

It will be readily perceived, by the lowness of the estimate, that the parapets of the works intended to be erected, are to be of earth; or, where that cannot easily be obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with strong timber, and filled in with such earth as can be had.

It is, however, conceived that, in most cases, earth may be procured, and that a parapet made thereof, will not only form a solid defence, but even be durable, if the earth be tenacious and properly sloped and sodded inside and out, and the seed of knotgrass sown, so as to bind the sods and earth together.

It is, however, apprehended that the embrasures, made in this manner, would suffer from the explosion of the powder from the cannon; and that, therefore, where the batteries are not en barbette, that the embrasures ought to be framed with joist, and faced with plank, of two inches thick.

When the batteries are to be erected on points of land, islands, or other places at a distance from the towns intended to be defended, they ought to be covered or secured by a redoubt, or other enclosed work, in which the garrison should reside constantly, either in a barrack or a strong block house, as shall be judged most expedient. But, in general, as the garrisons will be weak in numbers, a block house, mounting one or two small pieces of cannon in its upper story, will be more secure, and therefore to be preferred. These, however, ought not to be much, if any, exposed to the fire of heavy cannon. A block house will not contain more than fifty men; if the garrison, therefore, should be enlarged, tents must be used.

The redoubts, in general, ought to be of a size to contain five hundred men, so as to resist a sudden enterprise of an enemy; and, perhaps, the idea ought to be embraced, in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed at present to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and calked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have these magazines properly ventilated, and free from dampness. They are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed, will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy, either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will also direct what parts of your works shall be protected by frieze, and what by palisadoes; or, whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barbette, with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries, they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures. The batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, with all the combinations and effects depending thereon, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governor. It has not been intended, by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be executed. Outlines, only, have been given, to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

Some person, in whose ingenuity and industry confidence can be placed, will be appointed at the said ports, respectively, to superintend the actual execution of the works, according to your directions. Arrangements will also be made by him, or some other person, to obtain the necessary workmen, implements, and materials, which will be required in this business. But every thing must be previously calculated and estimated by you.

Although the business, herein entrusted to your charge, is, in itself, of an highly honorable nature, and strongly evincive of the confidence of the President of the United States, which would, probably, enhance your reputation, yet it is explicitly to be understood by you, that the employment is only temporary, and not conferring or involving any military rank whatever.

For a compensation for your services and personal expenses, you will be allowed and paid at the rate of four dollars per day, while you shall be employed. For all reasonable extra expenses, such as necessary boat hire, and persons to assist in your surveys, you will be allowed; but for those you must keep regular accounts and take receipts.

You are to deliver to the Governor of Virginia, copies of all your plans, surveys, soundings, &c. and also transmit copies of the same to this office.

You are also to make a weekly report to this office of your proceedings.

A reverberatory furnace, for red hot balls, must be erected for each battery.

You are hereby authorized to have made, in all cases where your judgment shall direct, new semi-circle carriages for cannon, now used on the sea-coast of France, instead of the old garrison carriages. This improvement, in firing en barbette, will prevent the necessity of embrasures, which, in most cases, serve no other purpose but as a trap to catch the enemy's balls, and kill the defenders of a battery. It is true, the expense will be greatly enhanced by adopting this improvement, but this will be lessened, in some degree, by saving the expense of the embrasures and platforms.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this 12th day of May, 1794.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

A Copy of Letters from John Vermonnet to the Secretary of War, respecting Fortifications.

SIR:

ALEXANDRIA, June 17, 1794.

Since I had the honor of receiving your favor of the 2d ultimo I have visited Jones' point, for which I have dressed a plan of defence, and of which I shall send you a draught on my return from Annapolis, where, in the meantime, Col. Fitzgerald will be collecting the materials, for which I have remitted him a bill.

I have also taken means for establishing a cross way through a marsh, which will enable the carrying of materials and earth, &c.

The logs, planks, and other timbers, are not to be had in the neighborhood without an enormous price, which has induced us to send to the Bay.

I have the honor to be, with respect, &c.

VERMONNET.

SIR:

ALEXANDRIA, July 5, 1794.

Immediately after my return from Annapolis, I have the honor to acquaint you of my having set the works in train at that place, after having received the sanction of the Governor and his council.

I shall take the liberty to forward you a draught of the work as soon as in my power.

I also take the liberty to forward you a draught of the work that I have begun at Alexandria at Jones' point, according to your order, and which is the only place at this present time to be minded, the difficulty of collecting materials, as well as the difference there is between the activity of the people of the southern states with the northern, is the cause of a great difficulty in forwarding any public work, though I am very attentive in my duty.

As there is a marsh between this city and Jones' point, I have been obliged to establish a cross-way, as it is marked on the draught—that work is to be done partly at the expense of the owner of the marsh.

I have acquainted the Governor of Virginia of my appointment.

The Battery of Jones' point will be a barbette, and calculated for receiving 12 pieces of heavy cannon.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, July 18, 1794.

SIR:

By this I take the liberty to forward you a draught of the fortification of Annapolis, by which you will see that part of the redoubt which protects the battery is a work of the last war, and which will enable the complement of the present fort, the lines colored yellow being the additional works.

The fort on the opposite side is only proposed in case the fund, and the exertions of public, will enable the erecting it; but the population of the place being small, I do not put great dependence on it. I am after finishing the cross-way at Alexandria, which will be done next week, unless it rains constantly, as it has been mostly the case this year, in this part. I intend to open the ditches as soon as the crossway is finished, which will perhaps be done before the logs are up. Col. Fitzgerald has contracted for them, but I am afraid that they will be long before to appear.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, 3d August, 1794.

SIR:

Having waited near two months for the necessary materials to begin the work at Alexandria, I am still without them, and as the crossway is done, I found myself under the necessity of retiring to Annapolis to visit what has been done there during my absence.

I delivered on the 9th June the note following into the hands of Col. Fitzgerald, which was appointed to supply me with materials, but as much by the fault of the people, that he has contracted with, as by his infirmity, the business has not been so expeditious as it ought to have been. He is now going to Bath for a month, and has left the business in the hands of Mr. Gray, a clerk in the custom house.

I think it necessary to give you this account that I may not be blamed for delay by the War Office.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, 12th August, 1794.

It is after my return from Annapolis, that I inform you, that the works there are very much advanced, and a believe I shall be able to finish this year, if the march of the militia towards Hagerstown should not cause some delay. As well as those of Alexandria towards Winchester. All the materials are mostly supplied, for which, likewise for labour, I remit you the amount already paid. At the complement of work, you will receive a particular account of all the expenses.

The sickly season, likewise the absence of the militia, at both departments I have the honor to attend, shall be a cause of some delay, yet I remain in hopes of finishing this year.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, Aug. 20, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to acquaint you of my return from Annapolis, where I have found the works much forwarder than those at Alexandria, notwithstanding the former were begun a month later.

The materials that I requested for Alexandria are not come yet, but I daily expect them; the cross-way is finished, the ditches are all opened, and the palisades are begun.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, 16th Sept. 1794.

SIR:

I take the liberty to inform you, that most of the materials are arrived, and are preparing for the battery.

The palisade and frieze are also much advanced, the exertion of public has taken place, and I am in hopes to forward the work greatly by the end of October.

JOHN VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 5, 1794.

SIR:

By the last letter that I wrote you, I had the honor to inform you of the state which the works were then in. The works will be closed by the 15th of this month, and will remain so till the 15th of April. The absence of part of the militia, has been the cause of not having the works finished. It is also to be observed that the appointments were made much later than in any part of the United States.

JNO. VERMONNET.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

FORTIFICATIONS AT WILMINGTON AND OCRACOCK, NORTH CAROLINA.

Instructions to Nicholas Francis Martinon, acting as temporary engineer in the service of the United States.

SIR:

In pursuance of the directions of the President of the United States, you are hereby appointed an engineer for the purpose of fortifying the ports and harbors hereinafter mentioned, viz: Wilmington and Ocracock inlet, in the State of North Carolina.

You are, therefore, immediately to repair to the ports to be fortified in the said State; and, in case the Governor should be near any of the said ports, you are to wait upon him and exhibit these instructions. But, if the Governor should be at any considerable distance from your route, you are respectfully to inform him of your appointment, enclose a copy of these instructions, and inform him that you have repaired to the ports aforesaid, in order to make the necessary surveys and investigations relatively to your mission, which you will submit to his consideration, and take his orders thereon.

As soon as you shall receive his approbation of your plans, you are to construct the works, and to execute them with all possible vigor and despatch.

The following is an extract of the estimate on which the appropriations for the fortifications have been founded. The proportions of expense, therefore, herein stated, for the ports aforesaid, must not be exceeded, viz:

WILMINGTON, Twelve Pieces.

Batteries, embrasures, and platforms, for 12 pieces,	-	-	-	-	$863 76
Magazine,	-	-	-	-	200 00
Redoubt with embrasures,	-	-	-	-	810 00
Blockhouse or barracks,	-	-	-	-	500 00
Contingencies,	-	-	-	-	500 00
					$2,873 76

OCRACOCK, Sixteen Pieces.

Batteries for 16 pieces,	-	-	-	-	$1,147 68
Redoubt with embrasures,	-	-	-	-	810 00
Magazine,	-	-	-	-	200 00
Block house or barracks,	-	-	-	-	500 00
Contingencies,	-	-	-	-	500 00
					$3,157 68

It will readily be perceived, by the lowness of the estimate, that the parapets of the works intended to be erected are to be of earth, or, where that cannot be easily obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with strong timber, and filled in with such earth as can be had.

And perhaps this idea ought to be embraced in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed, at present, to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and calked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have these magazines properly ventilated and free from dampness. They are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty pounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed, will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will also direct what part of your works shall be protected by freizes, and what by palisades, or whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barbette with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries, they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures. The batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, whether to have embrasures, or to fire en barbette with the new sea coast carriages, with all the combinations and effects depending on them, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governor. It has not been intended, by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be erected. Outlines only have been given to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

Some person, in whose ingenuity and industry confidence can be placed, will be appointed, at the said ports, respectively, to superintend the actual execution of the works, according to your directions. But every thing must be previously calculated and estimated by you.

Although the business herein entrusted to your charge, is in itself of an highly honorable nature, and strongly evincive of the confidence of the President of the United States, and which would probably enhance your reputation, yet it is explicitly to be understood by you, that the employment is only temporary, and not conferring or involving any military rank whatever.

For a compensation for your services, and personal expenses, you will be allowed and paid at the rate of four dollars per day, while you shall be employed. For all reasonable expenses, such as necessary boat hire and persons to assist in your surveys, you will be allowed; but for those you must keep regular accounts and take receipt.

You are to deliver to the Governor copies of all your plans, surveys, soundings, &c. and also transmit copies of the same to this office. You are also to make a weekly report to this office of your proceedings.

I have issued my warrant in your favor for two hundred dollars, as an advance on account of your compensation and personal expenses.

A reverberatory furnace for red hot balls must be erected for each battery.

All the plans must be accompanied with sections and elevations, so that a complete judgment may be formed thereof. An estimate of the expense must also be formed of each work, and the number and size of the cannon intended, must be specified.

Your requisition for labor and materials at Ocracock will be paid upon John Daves, collector at Newbern, or some person appointed by him, and at Wilmington, or Cape Fear, by some person who will be appointed by the collector at Wilmington.

This appointment to take place from the first of this instant, April.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this eleventh day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

GENERAL:

NEWBERN, May 31, 1794.

I have the honor to enclose you the plans, profiles, and estimates, respecting the fort to be established at Ocracock, vested with the Governor's approbation. On sight of the annexed map, you will be convinced that there is no point but Beacon Island that may be occupied with any degree of advantage. Being hurried to Wilmington, it has not been in my power to color the plan, which I have only traced. Your draughtsman will easily furnish it. I was obliged to make four copies of the same.

As no ship, drawing more than thirteen feet of water, can pass over the bar, this fort will never be exposed to the fire of a frigate, and, for that reason, I have given only eight feet in thickness to the summit of the parapet, which will be fully adequate to resist any attack from a privateer ship. I have also contracted the fort as much as it has been in my power, in order to lessen the expense, the estimate of which will surprise you. But the soil of the island is very low; it is essential to be defended against the high tides occasioned by northerly winds, and, in such circumstances, the greatest cautions ought to be taken. It is for that effect I have added a covert way, which will occasion a considerable expense. Shall it take place, or no?

The Governor of North Carolina will, no doubt, impart to you the dispositions he has made for that construction. Mr. John Wallace, the only inhabitant of the place, shall (under the conduct of a superintendent chosen, on my request, by the Governor) furnish laborers and materials, keeping a regular account of the same. These two persons have transported themselves on the spot on the 25th instant, and will be able to begin the work without any difficulty, as I have, in their presence, established the height of the different points, and traced the principal lines of the fort; I have, besides, furnished them plans and profiles. The solid fathom of earth which, in France, should cost about four livres towards, will, perhaps, come very high in this place, as it will be necessary to take the greatest part of it at a distance of sixty fathoms, at least, in places covered by the tide. There will be a loss of time for the workmen until the sands be discovered. It is, however, to be expected that the superintendent will find a way to keep them at work somewhere else, and that this time will not be entirely lost. To make short, in such a situation, instead of digging ditches that would furnish earth for the parapets, it becomes necessary to raise the ground by materials brought from afar.

I propose, for to lodge the garrison, a plain building, that will not overtop the parapets, and such as is described after the estimate. The expense of that construction will not be so expensive as that in timber, mentioned in the instructions; and for what respects the defence of the fort, it will, in any case, more efficaciously draw from the rampart and the palisades of the covered way.

On my return from Wilmington I will give a plan of these barracks, if you approve of their construction, and likewise of the powder magazine; in the contrary case, I will act agreeably to your orders, which I shall have time to receive.

You will judge, General, that the funds appropriated for Ocracock will not prove sufficient, and that it is essential to obtain an augmentation of them; I hope it will not be the same for Wilmington, towards which I intend to direct my course the day after to-morrow, say second of June.

Copy of a letter from M. Martinon to the Secretary of War, dated

MY GENERAL:

NEWBERN, 2d August, 1794.

Even as I have had the honor to observe to you of it, by my letter dated the ninth of last month, I arrived here the 24th, after much ado. Having found all the bridges spoiled by the heavy rains which fell in this country, and without my servant, our carriage was carried away by the current upon which it was swimming; at last we are arrived without any other accident.

I have the honor to send you enclosed the plans and papers relative to the works of the river Cape Fear. The indisposition of the Governor has occasioned a delay of some days for this sending; I am preparing the duplicates for him that I shall transmit to him as soon as possible.

I received an answer from Mr. Blanks, conductor of Beacon workings, by which he tells me that his work is not so advanced as he could hope for, he never having had but sixteen or eighteen laborers to work, who are continually absenting themselves. He is busied in cutting down nine hundred trees, of which four hundred are delivered upon the place, to make wheel barrows, and he tells me the platform will be done about the 9th of this month. At that time he will send for me to go upon the place, which I expect; it was better for him to be employed at the work, instead of employing other persons to work the timbers and wheelbarrows.

I observe to you, General, that the inhabitants of this country are but little inclined to the establishment of those forts. There are a great many, according to the information that I receive in New York and Charleston, who, instead of favoring the sending of workmen, on the contrary, augment their price of labor.

This work must be built with the activity I have recommended; could be continued a great while, particularly that of the beacon, and if it is not quickly raised, it will run the risk of being damaged by the inclemency of the winter.

The Governor had proposed to the general meeting which was lately sitting here, to make some funds for the construction of those forts, or only some advances; the answer has been negative. I think it necessary to give you this information.

The plans and instructions that I have delivered to Beacon, and for Cape Fear, would be sufficient to conduct the work to its end; nevertheless, the persons who are charged with it in Wilmington, depend that I will again take a journey, which I will do, if you judge it necessary. This I hope to be informed in the course of this month.

I observe also to you, General, that the longer I stay in this country the more money I shall expend, and should be sorry, as it would be of no utility; furthermore, my conduct will be subordinated to the orders that you will give to me.

CAPE FEAR RIVER FORT.—The levelling of the spot of ground in the interior circumference of the parapet, is related to an horizontal plan, which is supposed to be twenty-four feet above the level of high water, so that each red figure, which I call cotte, expresses the distance of each point from that horizontal plan which is called plan of comparison.

We might also imagine an inundation to the height of twenty-four feet above the level of the high water, and suppose the red figures to be the soundings of the different points.

Therefore, each cotte, or number, being taken off from the 24th one, which corresponds with the high water, the remainder will express the height of each point above the high water; and subtracting a number from another, the remainder will be the height of a point above another, for instance:

To have the height of the point A, above the point X, of the high water, ten feet must be taken off from twenty-four feet, the remainder being thirteen feet, is the height of the point A, above the high water.

To compare the point A with the point B, the number 9 feet 2 inches must be taken off from the number 11 feet, the remainder, 1 foot 10 inches, expresses the height of the point B above the point A, and so with the others.

Observations for the construction.

The battery may be finished before the remainder of the circumference of the fort is erected.

The battery will be carried on a level. The point A and the number 11 feet will be taken for the level of the berme, and the foundation of the under part of the first piece of timber will be fixed one foot lower than that point A, so that the beginning of the foundation will be in the levelling plan, the number 12 feet, the ground of the berme will be raised or lowered as wanted.

The parapets will be carried on the same level with the batteries, from the point C to the point H, in the lines cd, de, ef, fg, gh; the point K will be fourteen inches higher than the point H, and the lining, H K, of the curtain, will follow that slope; the flank, K L, will be carried on a level.

The flank angle M, of the bastion, will be on a level with the shoulder angle L, so that the flank, K L, and the face, L M, will be horizontal, and the angle M will be, by that mean, eight inches lower.

The shoulder angle N, will be six inches lower than the flank angle M; and the flank angle O, will be also six inches lower than the shoulder angle N; so that the face M N, and the flank N O, will have each a slope of six inches, and the foundation of timber, to the point O, will be one foot lower than that point, to the number 10, 8, 10.

The foundation of timber, to the point O, will be three inches higher than the one to the point p, of course nearly on a level; but the point q, middle of the line po, is two feet and a half lower than the point O, and is to be raised of so much; as, also, the berme and places near it, with remblais, taken with measure in the interior of the space, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, which will require to be carefully levelled, and lower the passage of the gate I, so that the waters may freely run out.

It would not be improper, in the demolition of the old fort, to preserve a certain quantity of stones to pave the entrance of the gate, and for other uses, in the interior of the fort.

The ditch of the battery will be four fathoms wide, besides its slopes; and though the ditches of the other sides of the fort are marked twenty feet wide, in the profile, they may be, with propriety, traced two feet wider, and in all twenty-two feet besides the slopes; it is a good way to obtain more earth with less depth.

A Memoir relative to the defence of Cape Fear River, to which is added a Map of the place for its intelligence.

The river of Cape Fear runs from north to south; it has two roads leading to the sea, the one to the west, the other to the north of Cape Fear.

The main bar inlet, west side, is two miles distant from the point of the island called Bald Head, where a lighthouse has been lately erected.

The sounding of that bar is fifteen feet at low water, and twenty-one at high water; of course, frigates may pass to it, and come to the harbor, which is six miles distant from the north side of that bar, and come to anchor in four and five fathoms.

This harbor is, perhaps, one of the best on the continent; the whole year may be spent there without the least danger, since all the vessels usually lay there in expectation of the wind, either to come up or go to sea.

The British were so well convinced of its importance, that they had erected there the Fort Johnston, which is now partly destroyed by the sea.

If this harbor should remain unguarded, there is no doubt but an enemy, in time of war, would not fail to take possession of it; he would make his station there; his privateers might preserve there all the prizes he would make on the north and south parts of the continent, till he had an opportunity of carrying them into his own ports; he would stop all the vessels attempting to go up or down the river; in a word, it would be to him a landing-place, to provide himself in the country, and do all the mischief in his power.

All these considerations having been an inducement to establish the intended fort, for the preservation of that place, it is intended for twelve pieces of cannon, which may be, without any inconvenience, of different size, from twenty-four to twelve pounds; however, the greatest number must be twenty-four pounds.

That quantity of guns is thought necessary for the security of the fort, which may be attacked by strong frigates; in that case, its strongest defence and annoyance will be in the establishment of a reverberatory furnace, red hot balls being the terror of vessels.

The access of the fort by land may be sufficiently defended with four field-pieces, to the flank angles of the two bastions. A landing could be effected at some leagues distance to the west, but it is very little to be feared; that part of the country being too marshy.

The sounding of the second inlet, called New Inlet, is seven feet at low water, and between eleven and twelve at high water; of course, there is none but small vessels and privateers that can come by it. It would be very well defended by a battery, with four pieces of cannon, at the north point of that inlet, called Federal Point; but the enemy having in his power to land all along the north side of that point, it would be necessary to erect a fort to protect that battery; which, requiring a guard in time of peace, as well as in time of war, would become very tiresome to the country. Another great inconvenience against that establishment is, the great rapidity of the inset's current, which would prevent the vessels from coming to without being exposed.

It is thought this inlet will be more powerfully and with less expense defended by a galley, or flat vessel, armed with eight pieces of twelve pounders; that vessels, which would be necessary only in time of war, could lay at anchor forward of Snow Point, in a place called Five Fathoms Hole, which is a good anchorage, and stop every vessel coming into the channel; it could go frequently to the New Inlet bar, and also serve the new fort and relieve its guard.

If it had been intended to defend only the upper part of the river, a single fort, at one of the Brunswick's points, might have been sufficient; but it was leaving in the enemy's possession the harbor, the two bars, and all the river shore below that point, and losing the power either to come in or go out of the river; of course, a very bad operation.

It would not be improper, in time of war, to place at Brunswick two pieces of cannon, with common carriages, to use them both against the river and against the land.

These considerations have been formerly presented to his Excellency the Governor of North Carolina, who has perceived all their consequences. It is in pursuance of his approbation, that the construction of the new fort is now at hand. It will be erected on a part of the seat of Fort Johnston, and on the ground round it; which ground is a part of the spot intended for a new town, called by the name of Smithville. That fort will defend the river and the access of the harbor. With regard to the New Inlet, it may be defended by one of the aforesaid means.

WILMINGTON, June 20, 1794.

GENERAL:

I have the honor to inform you of my arrival at Wilmington, on the 5th instant. It was not possible for me to go down the river before the 11th. I have spent five days in that voyage, to take the necessary information concerning the object of my mission.

The harbor, and excellent anchorage under Fort Johnston, appeared to me of such importance, that I propose the establishment of a battery and fort, in the proximity, and on part of Fort Johnston, which it becomes necessary to demolish.

Should the defence of the river be recoiled farther up, there would be a necessity of abandoning that post, which, in time of war, could not fail being taken hold of by an enemy, who, by settling there, would stop the entrance of the river. It would prove a sure retreat for their privateers to preserve their prizes in; they would have a footing on the continent, from whence they might draw provisions, spread in the country, and waste according to their pleasure. These considerations determine me to propose, that the establishment may be placed on that essential point of the principal passage of the river. By this means, the little northern channel, the sounding of which, at high water, gives eleven feet and a half on the bar, would be left open to the privateers, and give them an entrance in the river, unless guarded in some manner. Two ways are found, tending to that effect: the first is, to mount four or six eighteen pounders on one of Brunswick points, where the passage of the river shall be effectually defended. I would not advise to place that establishment on Federal Point, or even on the passage itself, because of the currents being so strong, that the safety of the vessels would prove endangered when obliged to stop for to be reconnoitred: this inconvenience will not take place at Brunswick. The second expedient, which, in my opinion, is the most advisable, would be an armed vessel, the strength of which might easily be calculated on that of the ships that may attempt passing over the bar. This vessel might anchor to the extremity of the harbor, or in different places between the harbor and Brunswick; and from thence protect the small vessels, whether entering or going out, and prevent privateers from coming up the river. Her object might be also to attend on the fort projected.

I have communicated these thoughts to the Governor, and expect to hear of his decision by the next post. I sent to him a plan; first, of a little fort, with two bastions, the ditch of which is tolerably well defended; secondly, of a simple redoubt, whose ditch has but a direct defence. These two forts may be manned, each of them, by five hundred men. I have enclosed, also, an estimate of these two objects, which amount much higher than the appropriated funds, because it is necessary to line the parapets with timber, as we cannot procure but a sand, which rains and wind would level very soon.

The cost of the fort, with bastions, will, agreeable to the estimate, amount to five thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars, comprehending the demolition of Fort Johnston, which, at any rate, must take place, as it is very small, partly destroyed by the sea, and what materials remain are rotten. The redoubt, whose ditch is ill defended, would cost four thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight dollars, including, likewise, the demolition of the old fort: the first is preferable on all accounts.

Until I receive the determination of the Governor, of which I expect to be apprized by next ordinary, I will have time enough to put in readiness the plans, so as to give them immediately to the appointed agent, or to the superintendent, agreeable to the orders which the Governor will think fit to issue. I shall have the honor to communicate them to you, when I direct you a copy of the project that will meet with the Governor's approbation.

From M. Martinon to the Secretary of War.

WILMINGTON, July 9, 1794.

GENERAL:

The Governor having approved of the dispositions I had directed to him on the 16th ultimo, and which I had the honor to communicate to you, in my letter dated June 20th, respecting the fort to be established on Cape Fear river, I have consequently transported myself on the spot, accompanied by Messrs. Potts and Atkins, the last gentleman having been appointed to direct the works. I have traced on part of Fort Johnston, and in the neighborhood of it, a small fort with two bastions, the parapet of which shall be lined with timber. I have taken the necessary levels to establish the foundations, and I have given to the gentlemen the plans, profiles, and memoirs, to direct the construction. Mr. Atkins told me he understood the whole perfectly well, and found no difficulty in it. Mr. Potts, who is at some trouble to procure workmen, has assured me, that on next Monday, say the 14th instant, he will send a sufficient number of them.

As I do not think that my presence will be of any necessity at this place, I will, towards the end of next week, transport myself to Newbern, and from thence I shall have the honor to forward you copies of the plans I am making, and which I will obtain the Governor to sanction.

I have proposed for to lodge the troops in a plain barrack as in Beacon. If you find it convenient I pray you be so good as to make it known to me as soon as possible.

Since I left Newbern I did not hear from Beacon Island's works, and I feel some anxiety on their account. This Island being very low, the work will be sometimes exposed to the attacks of the sea, swollen by northerly winds, which will expose the maintenance of them to be expensive. Had I foreseen that Congress should fix upon building ships for the protection of the sea coast, I would have advised to employ, for the defence of Newbern river, a galley, or vessel mounted with eight or ten twelve pounders, which would have proved sufficient, and might have saved the construction of a fort, its maintenance, garrison in time of peace and war, and the daily duty of that garrison, &c. I am going on the spot; I will examine the locality; confer with the Governor; and I shall give an account of it.

The Governor having desired my advice on the mode of mounting the cannon of the batteries, I have answered, that the parapets should have no embrasures, and that the essential point was to construct the carriages so as to elevate the cannon in order to point and fire over a parapet of five feet high; thus, I believe, will be mounted the cannon in Charleston, and in the other batteries.

I have now in hand the model made by Mr. Merlie, but, as there is no scale, I cannot know whether it has the necessary height. I remember Mr. Merlie told me in your room there were six inches wanting to the height, which might be made up without altering the inclination of the moving carriage, (which is important) by adding six inches to the last transom, and so much to the fixed frame. Respecting the model the Governor told me to be in Eden-ton, I know nothing of it. I hope I shall have the honor to hear from you when I arrive in Newbern.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Martinon to the Secretary of War, dated

NEWBERN, September 8, 1794.

MY GENERAL:

I have had the honor to transmit to you, the 2d of last month, the plans concerning the fort of the river of Cape Fear; I hope that you will have received them.

The journey I made to Beacon, to visit the works on the river of Cape Fear, was indispensable. The situation in which I found the works is not very satisfactory. There are three rows of timber works placed, three feet in height, all round the fort, but the main works very little filled in. The overseer of the works, instead of working during the favorable weather, and carrying sand, has been busy cutting wood with the workmen. That Mr. Wallace, as agent, was bound to undertake the work with more people, and Mr. Potts, at Cape Fear, but there have not been more than fourteen or fifteen hands at work for three months.

I have not seen Mr. Wallace at his house, nor at the works; and, as I was crossing the river, he was carrying to Newbern negro men, whom he had hired for three months. At my return, I met him in the instant of his departure with thirty negro men, whom he hired until the end of October; he assured me it was impossible to work upon the Island until the Spring. Such is the situation of the work, my General, which is very difficult to forward, as every thing is wanting. I have left Mr. Blanks, overseer, some necessary instructions, which have been translated into English by Mr. Leris.

I have been obliged to drive at Beacon, and brought here again in a vessel of the United States, Captain Cooke. I had made some provision to go with him to Cape Fear, but the wind having always been contrary, and my provision being done, I have been compelled to come back to Newbern, from whence I will set out, after to-morrow, for Wilmington by land.

The letters, that you will do me the honor to write to me, shall be thither directed.

Mr. Martinon to General Knox, Secretary of War, Philadelphia, dated

WILMINGTON, September 16, 1794.

GENERAL:

I have, at my arrival at Wilmington, received your most honored favor of the 8th of August last, in which you are advising me to contract the works of the fort of Ocracock, so that it may not exceed the sum mentioned in my instructions. I must confess, General, that I look upon it as impossible. I beg you will examine the plan I had the honor to forward, you will undoubtedly perceive that the space is not too large for the sixteen pieces of cannon it is intended for; be pleased, also, to take a view of the estimate and letters relating to it; in them you will find the reasons for which the estimate of the works amounts to three times the appointed sum; it would be too long to repeat them here.

I therefore think instant, if it be intended to continue on the works, that a sum of seven or eight thousand dollars should be disposed of for its expenses; and here follows the economical contraction which may take place: Having six pieces of cannon of the battery defending the small road over the river, mounted on embrasure carriages, the distance of 20 feet from a cannon, to another becoming useless, 12 feet will be sufficient; in that case 42 or 48 feet, or 6 or 7 fathoms, may be cut off from that battery; it will, of course, make a diminution of 15 or 16 current fathoms of rampart. The fort will then be very much flattened, and the remaining space will scarcely be large enough to contain the barrack, which must also be shortened; the two-thirds of the covert way may also be put aside, and have it made only on the north side of the fort, so as to secure it against the high waters. Notwithstanding all the contractions, which there is time enough to effectuate, I foresee that the expense will overgo the sum of six thousand dollars; what may account for it is the bad kind of workmen the country affords; the high price required by the owners of the negroes; the loss of time which a navigation of eighty miles occasions; the distance of the sand, which can be had but at low water; many other private expenses for the beginning of the establishment, and many other inconveniences, which so lonesome and so distant a place creates. I am, myself, at more than a month's distance from one fort to another, either to go or send letters, for want of vessels or of fair winds.

In all cases, General, the expenses being left to persons no doubt honest, and appointed by the Governor, they will settle their accounts; and, as the works at Beacon Island must be stopped at the end of October next, by comparing the expense with the work done at that time, we may acquire more certain notions of what the whole is to cost.

I pray you will recollect I informed you that I would prefer, for the defence of Newbern river, a kind of armed galley, which, at all events, might have been sufficient; and its invaluable advantage should be to save the trouble of the keeping of a fort and constant garrison in time of peace, which garrison will require a vessel to relieve the guards and to transport the stores, which must be brought from Newbern, &c.

You have no doubt received the works of Cape Fear river, where the fort is much larger than that of Beacon, because the twelve pieces of cannon, which are to be mounted on sea coast carriages, will stand in the same line. These twelve pieces are necessary to protect the fort against the fire of frigates which may come to attack it; it is also constructed to contain a greater number of men to defend it by land; the situation requires and permits it. As the parapets are to be lined with timber, on account of the sandy quality of the earth, the expense will be nearly double the sum granted, which you are already informed of as well as the Governor. It is not in my power to prevent such increase of expense; but, with regard to fortifications, what is necessary must be done; and, it may be said with propriety, that the person who has drawn the estimates, on which the funds have been obtained, has been greatly mistaken. They have been working at Cape Fear these two months past. I intend going there the day after to-morrow, in Captain Cooke's vessel, and I shall inform you of the state of the works.

In consequence of the diminution to be made to the fort of Beacon, I am informing Mr. Tredwell, Collector at Edenton, in my answer to his letter, that ten pieces of cannon must be mounted on sea coast carriages, for the battery of the main channel side, as it requires a more divergent fire; four or five of those cannons may be eighteen pounders, the rest must be thirty-four pounders; as for the battery of the second inlet, six pieces are to be mounted on embrasure carriages; four of these twenty-four pounders, and two eighteen pounders, if they cannot be all twenty-four pounders. These batteries do require heavy cannon, on account of the reach, which is somewhat distant.

As to the cannon of Cape Fear river, it may be of smaller size. 24, 18, and 12 pounders might be employed there, and must be all mounted on sea coast carriages, so that they may afford a more divergent fire; I must, however, observe, that a different size of cannon in a battery which is to have a reverberatory furnace, may be liable to some inconveniences; it is, therefore, much preferable that all the cannon should be of one size.

I believe, General, that in order to have the sea coast carriages mounted in the most uniform manner, it would not be improper, if Mr. Merlie is much advanced in his works to the South he should be sent to Edenton and Wilmington; he might in each of these two places construct a sea coast carriage which may serve as a model to construct the others.

I shall spend some days to the fort, and on my return here will start for Newbern.

I am, with respect, General, your most humble servant,

MARTINON.

Mr. Martinon to General Knox, Secretary of War, (Philadelphia) dated

WILMINGTON, September 30th, 1794.

GENERAL:

I have made a stay of eight days to the fort of Cape Fear. The job, after two months' work, is not very much advanced. The state in which I found it is such as follows: The barracks are almost ended, the demolition of the old fort very much advanced, and very little remblais made. There is about two hundred logs on the spot; Mr. Atkins, superintendent of the works, had, in my presence, the first pieces of timber of the linings placed; I found the workmen in little activity. Behold the reasons, given to me by Mr. Potts! A warrant has been issued for the sum of one thousand dollars, which are expended; Mr. Potts has wrote to obtain new funds, and having received no answer, was upon the point of stopping the works; he has, however, continued on by the means of four hundred dollars, which, he told me, he was in advance of.

I must observe to you, General, that a too small number of workmen will increase the private expenses, which should, and can be avoided, to Cape Fear—the workmen being not scarce there, as they are at Ocracock; an over-seer for ten workmen may do for a hundred.

With regard to the whole expense, you are already informed it will be double the sum granted; it is according to that information which I gave the Governor, that he has ordered the works to be begun: it has been so with the fort at Beacon, which I foretold would require three times the sum appointed. Without these proceedings the idea of erecting the forts must be dropped; for each of them, I have been obliged to draw four different plans, so as to find the smallest expense. I even perceive that my estimates are rather short, though carried to the highest, on account of the negroes being dearly paid, and doing very little work, if not constantly attended to.

A redoubt, with four pieces of cannon, and fifty or sixty men, might sufficiently defend the road of the new inlet; if so, the river of Cape Fear will be sufficiently protected. If you think it proper, I will make a project for that purpose.

I have made use for my transportation in the river of Captain Cooke's vessel; he could not convey me to Ocracock, having to change the masts of the cutter, which are both sprung and rotten.

I shall go shortly to Newbern by land, and will prepare the contractions, which, as I have mentioned in my last, of the 16th instant, may take place, to diminish a part of the expense at Beacon.

If you judge my presence necessary in this country after October next, I beg you will direct me to some person to whom I may apply for money, mine diminishing, and Mr. Leris's being at an end. Out of the four hundred dollars I have received, two hundred and sixty have been expended to the Government's account. I shall direct you the state and receipts thereof, when you think it proper.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, General, your most obedient and most humble servant,

MARTINON.

Copy of a letter from Joshua Potts, agent for procuring materials, &c. to the Secretary of War, dated WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA, October 2d, 1794.

SIR:

Conformably to instructions received, enclosed is an abstract of articles purchased for the fort at Cape Fear, which exhibits the amount of moneys actually disbursed and paid, one thousand and sixty-one dollars twenty cents. The articles purchased with the above sum, will be observed to consist principally of commissary's stores, camp equipage, tools for mechanics and laborers, machinery and materials for the barracks, &c.

The agent begs a moment of your honor's attention, while he informs you, that in the mean time of making preparation as above alluded to, it became expedient that contracts should be made for materials, labor, &c. to be in readiness at any stage of the work; accordingly agreements were made, and are still to be discharged.

1st. The pitch pine hewed timber, intended to build the walls of the parapet, (say *three hundred and sixty tons of forty solid feet each, French measurement, at one dollar and eighty cents per ton, deliverable at the fort, is, $648 00

2d. Building the barracks; the carpenter's work is contracted for by the square, and will require about 200 00

3d. Wages of laborers, and a mechanic since 14th July to 1st instant, say two months and a half, of about twenty-one persons, average six dollars per month, - - - - - 315 00

4th. The butcher's bill for beef may be - - - - - 80 00

The first mentioned sum, actually expended and paid, is accurately inserted, per abstract, - - - 1,061 20

But the additional amount is set down only on a gross estimate, in order to give information on the subject, - - - - - 1,243 00

$2,304 20

The respective sums contracted for are as nearly computed as at present lies in the power of the agent, and shall, when discharged, be returned in a certain and proper manner.

By the enclosed abstract, and the foregoing estimate, the sum, as apportioned for this fort, is not half actually paid away, but more than the first moiety is contemplated, by adding the amount of contracts still to be paid.

The quantity of timber, of itself, to be used on the fort, as planned, would cost half the sum as first estimated for the completion of the entire fortification.

Peculiar circumstances unavoidably guided the manner of commencement, as also the progress of building the fort.

1st. The situation, distant from a settled neighborhood, the soil sandy, which, without hesitation, would require walls of firm substance to contain it, of course large timbers of pitch pine were by the engineer deemed the most convenient, and the cheapest material for that purpose.

2d. An old fort of lime mortar and shell cement walls was, in the first place, tedious and difficult to be demolished; the earth and terrace within to be levelled by removal, and the former ditches to be filled up. This last mentioned work has hitherto chiefly employed the laborers, and required to be effected, before a beginning of the new fort could be attempted. This part alone was a considerable object.

3d. The custom and disposition of laborers here, whether masters of slaves or otherwise, is, not to be employed, by a particular contract, to perform removal of earth, &c. by measurement, nor could any laborers be employed on condition of finding themselves either provisions or tools.

The only resource, therefore, either to begin, or continue, the erection of the fort, was to hire laborers by the month, and to find them rations, utensils of cooking, and tools to work with; the whole of which supply has been committed to the care of a superintendent.

Exclusively of levelling the former fort, the laborers have been employed, by intervals, in fixing ways and rollers to manage large timbers from the water up the hill, and around the fort; also, at times, in carrying up timbers, scantling, boards, shingles, &c.

You will please observe, that in order to forward the building of the fort, it became expedient that contracts for materials, &c. as before said, should be made, so as to be in readiness when required, and which should prevent any delay of operation that certainly otherwise would have happened, especially, as hitherto, only one thousand dollars have been ordered to the hands of the agent, it would have been greatly disadvantageous to have discontinued the work precisely at the expenditure of the said sum, and then to have recommenced the same on receiving an additional supply of money. The situation and nature of the undertaking was such as would by no means, consistent with the interest of the United States, admit of an interval.

Reliance is therefore had that the remaining part of $2,873 76, say $1,873 76, will be ordered for the purpose of discharging the necessary contracts already mentioned, and further to carry on the building of the fort.

The carpenter's work of the house for the barracks is now nearly done; but in regard to the fort, it can only be said, with propriety, to be begun, therefore it is impossible to say or to judge at this time, any proportion the present expenditure bears in comparison to the whole. Whenever the progress of the work will properly admit, the said proportion shall be transmitted.

Mr. Martinon, the engineer, informs me that he has wrote to you on the subject of the fort. I presume his letters contain information that the said $2,873 76, will certainly be far inadequate to the completion of the fort. The peculiar and unfavorable circumstances, as aforementioned, render it an impossibility to finish the same with the sum first estimated.

* This is not more than half the quantity of timber estimated for that purpose.

Should a further sum be allowed, it would be to the interest of the United States that the same be timely ordered, to the end that a discontinuance of the work should not happen.

I have now to apologize for the length of this letter, by assuring you that it has been thus extensively continued with the intent of conveying to your idea a full view of all circumstances and parts of the premises.

Copy of a letter from the Governor of North Carolina to the Secretary of War, dated

NEWBERN, November 4, 1794.

SIR:

Mr. Blanks, the superintendent of the works of the fort at Beacon Island, returned a few days since from that place, and informs me that he has raised the foundation agreeable to the plan which was forwarded to you by the engineer, three feet nine inches above the surface. The time for which the hands, who were employed about this work, having expired, together with the disadvantages of the approaching season, has induced him to think it most for the interest of the United States, that nothing further should be done until the spring. The superintendent suggests as a reason why the works are not more advanced than they are, is owing to the particular situation of the place, he not being able only to work at such times as the tide would permit. He is of opinion that the most material part of the work is accomplished. He has applied to me to know from whom he is to receive his pay; and as you have been silent on the subject, I have to request that you will inform me on whom he is to call for it.

RICHARD DOBBS SPAIGHT.

FORTIFICATIONS AT CHARLESTON AND GEORGETOWN, SOUTH CAROLINA, AND AT SAVANNAH AND ST. MARY'S, GEORGIA.

Instructions to Paul Hyacinthe Perrault, acting as temporary Engineer, in the service of the United States.

SIR:

In pursuance of the directions of the President of the United States, you are hereby appointed an engineer, for the purpose of fortifying the port and harbor of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

You are, therefore, immediately to repair to that place, and in case the Governor should be near the said port, you are to wait upon him and exhibit these instructions. But, if the Governor should be at any considerable distance from the said port, you are, respectfully, to notify him of your appointment, enclose a copy of these instructions, and inform him that you have repaired to the port aforesaid, in order to make the necessary surveys and investigations, relatively to your mission, which you will submit to his consideration and take his orders thereon.

As soon as you shall receive his approbation of your plan, you are to construct the works, and to execute them with all possible vigor and despatch.

The following is an extract of the estimate, on which the appropriations for the fortifications have been founded. The proportion of expenses, therefore, herein stated, for the port aforesaid, must not be exceeded, viz :

Charleston, to be fortified with 72 pieces, which may be divided into three sets of batteries and redoubts, $11,212 32

It will be readily perceived, by the lowness of the estimate, that the parapets of the works intended to be erected, are to be of earth, or, where that cannot easily be obtained of an adhesive quality, the parapets may be faced with strong timber, and filled in with such earth as can be had.

It is, however, conceived that, in most cases, earth may be procured, and that a parapet made thereof will not only form a solid defence, but even be durable, if the earth be tenacious and properly snoted, and sodded inside and out, and the seed of knotgrass sown so as to bind the sods and earth together.

It is, however, apprehended that the embrasures made in this manner would suffer from the explosion of the powder from the cannon, and that, therefore, where the batteries are not en barbette, that the embrasures ought to be formed of joist, and faced with plank of two inches thick.

When the batteries are to be erected on points of land, islands, or other places, at a distance from the towns intended to be defended, they ought to be covered, or secured, by a redoubt or other enclosed work, in which the garrison should reside constantly, either in a barrack, or a strong block house, as shall be judged most expedient. But, in general, as the garrisons will be weak in numbers, a block house mounting one or two small pieces of cannon, in its upper story, will be more secure, and therefore to be preferred. These, however, ought not to be much, if any, exposed to the fire of heavy cannon. A block house will not contain more than fifty men. If the garrison, therefore, should be enlarged, tents must be used.

The redoubts, in general, ought to be of a size to contain five hundred men, so as to resist a sudden enterprise of an enemy, and perhaps the idea ought to be embraced, in the first instance, that they should be of such extent as to admit timber casemates, to be erected hereafter, so as to enable the garrison to resist, in some tolerable degree, a bombardment.

But it is not proposed, at present, to erect such casemates, excepting for a magazine, which must be formed of massy timber, and be six feet thick on the roof, exclusive of the earth, and jointed and calked in such a manner as to be perfectly tight. Care must be taken to have these magazines properly ventilated, and free from dampness. They are to be of a size sufficient to hold one hundred and fifty rounds of powder for each piece of cannon intended to be served from it. The spot at which a magazine of this nature shall be fixed, will require great judgment, so as to combine security against an enemy, either open or subtle, or any danger from common accidents.

Your judgment will also direct what parts of your works shall be protected by fraizes, and what by palisadoes, or whether your redoubts shall have embrasures, or fire en barbette with small cannon. As the redoubts are to cover the batteries they would certainly secure and resist better without embrasures. The batteries are to annoy.

The choice of the ground on which the batteries and works are to be erected, whether to have embrasures, or to fire en barbette, with the new sea coast carriages, with all the combinations and effects depending on them, will rest upon your judgment, under the directions of the Governor. It has not been intended, by any thing herein specified, to point out the particular manner in which the works should be erected. Outlines only have been given, to serve in regulating the expense, which is limited by the sums before mentioned.

Some person, in whose ingenuity and industry confidence can be placed, will be appointed, at the said port, to superintend the actual execution of the works according to your directions. Arrangements will also be made, by him, or some other person, to obtain the necessary workmen, implements, and materials, which will be required in this business. But every thing must be previously calculated and estimated by you.

Although the business, herein entrusted to your charge, is, in itself, of a highly honorable nature, and strongly evincive of the confidence of the President of the United States, and which would probably enhance your reputation, yet it is to be explicitly understood by you, that the employment is only temporary, and not conferring, or involving, any military rank whatever.

For a compensation for your services, and personal expenses, you will be allowed and paid at the rate of four dollars per day, while you shall be employed. For all reasonable extra expenses, such as necessary boat hire, and persons to assist in your surveys, you will be allowed; but for those you must keep regular accounts and take receipts.

You are to deliver to the Governor copies of all your plans, surveys, soundings, &c. and also transmit copies of the same to this office. You are also to make a weekly report to this office of your proceedings.

I have issued my warrant, in your favor, for two hundred dollars, as an advance on account of your extra expenses. For any sums you may require, on account of your compensation and personal expenses, you must apply to me, and I shall order the same to be paid in Charleston.

A reverberatory furnace for red hot balls must be erected for each battery.

All the plans must be accompanied with sections and elevations, so that a complete judgment may be formed thereof. An estimate of the expense must also be formed of each work, and the number and size of the cannon intended must be specified.

You will have under your immediate orders Jerome Merlie, as a director of artillery artificers, to mount the new gun carriages, and John James Lairis, as sub-engineer and interpreter. This appointment to take place from the first of this instant, April.

Given at the War Office of the United States, this eleventh day of April, 1794.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

SIR:

You will please to understand, as you have Mr. Stouff under your orders, that your commission will now extend to the fortifications of Charleston and Georgetown, in South Carolina, and to Savannah and St. Mary's, in Georgia. The places first to be attended to are Charleston and Savannah. Upon your arrival at the former, you are to send Mr. Stouff to survey Savannah river.

WAR OFFICE, April 19, 1794.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

Copy of a letter from P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, May 4th, 1794.

I have the honor respectfully to inform you, that, after a passage of fourteen days, I am just arrived at Charleston. I immediately waited on the Governor, and showed him my instructions, &c. His Excellency was to go the day following to Columbia. He informed me that he had already begun some work, under the direction of Colonel Senf, viz: a battery at one of the wharves of the city, and a little other work at Fort Johnston; the expenses of the first battery are very considerable; the purchase of wood only, being eight hundred and three dollars. You may judge from this the extravagant price of work here.

Mr. Stouff will sail for Savannah the first favorable wind. Mr. Merlie has made a state of the materials wanted for carriages, and given it to Mr. Desaussure, but this gentleman says he cannot immediately find dry wood, either of oak or ash, and that it will not be possible before the next year. At the same time it may be too expensive perhaps to complete all the work with Acajou wood. I think it would be better if you was to send from Philadelphia the wood necessary for the great chase; and in the mean time Mr. Merlie will employ himself in making the little, and Mobile carriages, of Acajou wood. Should you think it better, he will, on your subsequent order, make the great chase of pitch pine wood, but it will be very unsold.

I soon visited the harbor and made several soundings. To-morrow I shall draw again the more important places where I suppose the batteries will be necessary, in order to fix exactly the just distance between them, and be able to calculate their effect, respectively.

I suppose that, with four fortifications, in addition to the battery of Col. Senf, the protection of Charleston harbor will be very complete; but I cannot help observing to you, that the money allowed is too inconsiderable, and I beg you to give me some directions in order to make something useful. You may be assured that I will conduct myself with all possible economy.

You forgot to include in my instructions, what money is appointed for Savannah, Cape St. Mary's, and Georgetown. I beg you to give me immediate information on that subject, in order that I may be able to regulate my projects and calculations on it.

Mr. Merlie has just now told me that he has found the necessary wood in Acajou to complete his work. This wood in my opinion is the better, and he will, with your leave, perform all his work with this wood, in the mean time he will make the Mobile carriages.

It is probable that Mr. Merlie will meet with the same difficulty at Savannah, and probably it will not be so easily got over as here; so that perhaps it might be better that Mr. Merlie should make all the carriages here, as well for Charleston as for Savannah, Cape St. Mary's, and Georgetown, and ship them, when finished, for the respective harbors.

From P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, May 12, 1794.

I have the honor respectfully to inform you, that I have taken the plan of the whole of Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, and the plan of Fort Johnston. I shall pursue my operations without any interruption, and hope that they will be incessantly finished, and that I shall be able, in the course of next week, to submit all my plans of operation to the approbation of General Moultrie.

On the idea of adhering to the strictest economy, Mr. Merlie has not yet obtained a place for his works, and I cannot help observing how many difficulties are occasioned by the absence of the Governor; the loss of time resulting from it is inexpressible, and must necessarily hinder me for a long time from beginning my works. I wrote to his Excellency some time since, to obtain a place for Mr. Merlie; last Saturday I ought to have received an answer, for the want of which I shall lose another week. I wish to have notice of the money appointed for Savannah and Georgetown, before my departure from this place. Mr. Stouff has sailed for Savannah.

It will be necessary, likewise, that Mr. Desaussure should receive positive orders to give me all necessary supplies on my first requisition; his praiseworthy wishes to fulfil his appointment with the most complete economy, cause much discussion and loss of time. I had found a place for Mr. Merlie in the arsenal, but Mr. Desaussure was answered by Mr. Lenox, the arsenal keeper, that the Governor's consent must be first obtained, in consequence of which I wrote to his Excellency, but, as I said before, have not received an answer, and Mr. Desaussure tells me there is no other place but this arsenal, and a little market, for which place the Governor's consent is likewise necessary.

From P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, May 31st, 1794.

I have had the honor to receive your letter, and am very glad to find that General Jackson is of the same opinion with myself and Mr. Stouff; I consequently wrote to the latter to make the necessary operations.

I have indeed found great hindrance, and Mr. Merlie has scarcely begun his work. It would be necessary, I believe, to tell Mr. Desaussure positively that nothing more is requisite than for me to ask, and for him to supply whatever may be wanting.

I had begun, and almost terminated my directions, when sounding and searching in every part of the harbor, I discovered a sand bank, largely dry at low water, and keeping one hundred and fifty fathoms long, and sixty wide to high water; it was believed generally by the pilots, that this sand bank was discovered only at low water, and that its formation had taken place from fifteen to twenty years. This discovery necessarily altered my first disposition.

I send to you the map containing the exact position of this new place; the Governor was amazed when I told him of it, and (before any thing was concluded on) wished to see it; I cannot myself determine, before he has decided on so important a matter. You will find on the map an explanation of the great advantages of this situation. It is morally impossible that, with a fort on this sand bank, and with another on Sullivan's Island, provided with red hot bullets, any vessel can pass without being burnt, for they both cross one another at the distance of blank shot. The Governor is apprehensive of nothing, but for the solidity of the foundation, and the vehement fury of the waves. He would have walked on the place last week, but his ill state of health would not permit it; he intends to examine it this week.

From P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, June 16th, 1794.

I explained in my former letters the obstructions resulting from the Governor's absence and indisposition, and the economy of Mr. Desaussure. I have been indeed much perplexed, but hope all the works will be in as good a train as possible; the Governor has appointed the places to be fortified, and the direction of those fortifications. I will constantly send you copies of the draughts of them, with the estimation of their expense. The Governor not having agreed with my directions, I believe it will be proper, I send you, for my discharge, a memorial concerning that matter.

The Governor will, without doubt, write you on the subject of the patriotism and zealous endeavors of the citizens of Charleston. They opened a subscription for supplying the money directed by Congress, which was indeed too small for the nature of the work, absolutely necessary in this country, where nothing but sand can be found, and which necessitates us to make use of timber revetments both before and behind. On calculation, every twenty feet amount to five hundred dollars. The places designed to be fortified are Sullivan's Island, Fort Johnston, one battery on a wharf, and another on a little sand bank, opposite Shute's folly.

Mr. Merlie has begun his works. I think it would be convenient that he should make in this city the carriages for Savannah, for he would spare the resulting expense of a new establishment, and purchase of tools, which would indeed be very extravagant. It will be very easy to send the carriages by water to Savannah when they are finished.

Extract from P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, July 28th, 1794.

The money appointed for the work of Mr. Merlie is spent—there are only four carriages done. You wish for sixty—with what money are they to be performed? I am obliged to stop this work from the first of August, until I receive new orders on your part—the other works are in train, and I hope that the additional money of the subscription, with that supplied by this State, will be sufficient for their accomplishment. The works at Georgetown and Savannah are likewise begun.

Extract from P. H. Perrault to the Secretary of War, dated

CHARLESTON, August 19th, 1794.

“The work is carrying on very actively, not only in Charleston, but in Savannah and Georgetown—the battery in the city of Charleston is almost finished.”

Copy of a letter from D. De Saussure to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, 7th July, 1794.

I wrote to you the — May last, enclosing copy of a requisition made by Mr. Merlie for sundry materials and workmen to set about making the gun carriages ordered on new construction, and I then stated the smallness of the sum for the object contemplated; and as I considered it imprudent to postpone commencing the work until I received your answer, I made a beginning, by procuring a proper place for a workshop, and collected some materials and workmen, and I enclose you an abstract of the actual expenditure in that work up to the 30th ult. amounting to seven hundred and seventy-one dollars, thirty cents. I refer you to a note I have made on the abstract, of several charges which will come into this account, and which cannot at present be ascertained; but will altogether form a considerable sum, perhaps such a one as will, in addition to the abstract, amount to more than one thousand dollars, the sum allotted. The workmen are still employed under Mr. Merlie, and will continue so to the end of this month, at which time they must cease, unless I receive new directions, with funds for supplies previous thereto, and at which time I do not suppose there will be more than five or six of the carriages completed.

You have, herewith, an abstract of the expenditures for the fortifications at Fort Darrell and Fort Johnston, amounting to three thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars twenty-nine cents, including materials and workmanship previous to Mr. Perrault's arrival. Those works I formerly stated to you were begun under the direction of Col. Senf, by order of the Governor, and as those works have been continued by Mr. Perrault, with such of the materials as remained, I deemed it proper to pay those accounts. Fort Darrell is far advanced in its completion, and for some time past it has been of no expense to the United States for mechanical labor—that part being done gratis by the carpenters of this city. We have a great number of negroes sent gratis, who are employed as common laborers to remove the timber from place to place, and filling in the earth as the wood work rises. I presume Mr. Perrault has informed you it is not possible to erect any works here with earth, unless first cased with timber, the earth being of a very light soil, nay, sand itself, consequently not adhesive.

Although negroes have been sent gratis, it was stipulated rations should be supplied to them. I consented to do so, on the principle of propriety; as we have the labor gratis, it is as little as we can do to feed them. Subscriptions for carrying on the fortifications have been liberal—eight thousand days' labor of negroes, four thousand feet of ranging timber, and between seven and eight hundred pounds, have been subscribed; in consequence of which the laborers have begun at Fort Johnston and Sullivan's Island, to prepare to begin the works. You will observe two canoes charged in the account; it is unavoidable, as we could not transport the timber from one place to another, and also the people employed at Fort Johnston and Sullivan's Island, without; and I found by experience, it would not do to hire them; there is also a charge for a horse, saddle, and bridle, furnished Mr. Perrault; he alleged he wanted a horse to go from one work to another here, and that he must be found one at the expense of the United States—he enforced his claim by an order from the Governor. I will thank you for your opinion on this article.

From D. De Saussure to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR:

CHARLESTON, 13th Sept. 1794.

I have received the two thousand dollars additional which you directed to be remitted on account of the artillery department. I now enclose you an abstract statement on that account up to 31st last month, amounting to two thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars thirty-four cents, which leaves a balance of six hundred and fifty-six dollars sixty-six cents, which will be expended by the end of the present month, in completing six carriages on the new plan: these, however, are nearly finished, but the Governor has ordered Mr. Merlie twelve carriages for twenty-four pounders, on the old construction, six of which are about, but the above balance will fall short of the expense for the six on hand; besides, there will be a variety of charges which cannot be ascertained at present; consequently, if you choose the work to continue, it will be absolutely necessary to order me a further remittance. I can assure you, I spare no pains in procuring the materials with all the expedition possible, and I can aver that no part of the works have been delayed through my inattention. Although I have constantly had negroes on hire, and others sent gratis, we have not been able to get as many as could be employed.

Mr. Habersham has requested I would employ five hundred dollars (which he is to reimburse me) in making carriages for Savannah, as it was difficult to find the proper materials there, but this sum will scarcely be sufficient to make more than two. I am informed of the fort built there is altogether en barbette; if so, two will be of little or no consequence. On a conversation with Mr. Merlie, he thinks it would be as well to have the whole made here, and then sent to Savannah; having the workshop already fixed here, there would be no new expense on that score, and it will not be more expensive to transport the carriages, than the mahogany, which must be got here. I have no doubt the iron work will be cheaper here than at Savannah. You will be so good as to give me the earliest instructions on this subject; for the present, the workmen will set about two carriages for Savannah, the expense of which shall be kept separate from those for this place.

Enclosed you have an abstract of the expenses incurred up to the 31st of August for the fortifications, amounting to seven thousand one hundred and eighty-five dollars, thirty-four cents; exclusively of the above amount there is nearly one thousand dollars' worth of ranging timber delivered at Fort Johnston and Sullivan's Island, for which I have not yet received the bill—those works being on a large scale, will require a considerable quantity of lumber and workmanship, which in my opinion will considerably exceed the sum appropriated by the President, and that subscribed by the citizens. My engagement, with individuals, either for materials or labor, is to pay monthly, which I have hitherto complied with when called upon; at present my funds are nearly exhausted, and unless the collector can make me an advance, before he receives directions to place money in my hands, I shall be disagreeably circumstanced.

FORTIFICATIONS AT WEST POINT.

State of the Works ordered at West Point, stating their situation in the present day of the last of August. New York, August 31st, 1794. By COLONEL VINCENT.

FORT PUTNAM.—The repairing of the enclosure of the fort is now going on; one part has been altered, according to the strong reasons reported in one memorial, which has not yet been seen by the minister; but, as that part of the enclosure to be changed was to be new built, it will be a very trifling expense to make the useful proposed alteration.

FORT CLINTON.—It will not be possible for this year to begin any works; and it will be sufficient to collect every necessary material, during this season, in order to be ready to begin very early in the beginning of the spring. It should be also very useful, to begin this year the digging of the foundations, in employing the diggers at the task by cubic fathoms. We think that this way is the only one to be used in the works ordered by the General Government, inasmuch as the laborer's day's work is very high.

OBSERVATIONS.—The works at West Point are directed by the Major Niven, who may hardly be sufficient for so great a business. It will be necessary to employ one engineer more, principally for the important masonry to be erected there, which will require great knowledge in that line. The manner of carrying on all the necessary diggings by task, requires also one man, accustomed to such works, and daily upon the spot. The able commander, and clever man, Mr. Fleming, ought also obtain the first superintendency upon these important works.

Copy of the Report of Daniel Niven to the Secretary of War, relatively to the Fortifications at West Point; dated PHILADELPHIA, December 12, 1794.

SIR:

I conceive it my duty to make the following report: That, from the 20th of May to the 18th day of July last, I was employed in superintending lime-burning, collecting stone to Fort Clinton, making and repairing roads, making and repairing tools, and repairing such parts of the rear wall of Fort Putnam as I judged sufficient. On the said 18th day of July, Mr. Vincent, Captain Fleming, and myself concluded, that all the old wall of Fort Putnam, facing Fort Clinton, be taken down and rebuilt; enclosing the point, for the advantage of enlarging the battery facing the ridge, where Forts Webb and Willis stood. Accordingly, I proceeded, and employed as many miners, masons, laborers, and teams, as I could find, that would work to advantage, and have taken away the old wall and built a new one, with the foundation on the rock, agreeably to your instructions, on durable principles of masonry. The said new wall is raised from twenty to twenty-five feet high, except the gate-way, for want of free-stone to face the arch. Nine bomb proof arches are closed over the barracks and magazines. I had hopes to finish four more, but the days are so short and cold, and the frost would damage the masonry so much, if the mortar could be worked, that I judged it best to discharge the workmen on the 22d day of November, except a very few under the direction of Captain Fleming. It was impossible to carry on the works without great damage to the public service.

Several arrangements ought to be made this winter, that the works may be carried on to advantage the ensuing season; that the laborers be hired by the month, and forfeit something if they leave the works without timely notice; that a forage store be established; that the brick be moulded in the shape of a key stone, to turn the arches. This will make strong work, and save great labor.

Enclosed is a rough sketch of Fort Putnam, made in the manner I should recommend it to be finished.

D. NIVEN.

Copy of a circular letter to the persons employed to obtain labor, implements, and materials, for the Fortifications.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1794.

SIR:

You having been appointed for the purpose of obtaining the labor, implements, and materials, for the fortifications which are to be erected at _____, in pursuance of a law of the United States, for that purpose, are to regard the following instructions as the general rule of your conduct.

First. Upon the engineer's or superintendent's of the works making a requisition upon you, in writing, for labor or workmen, to erect earth works, of the description which he shall give, you will consider well whether the object described could be accomplished, with more economy, by a contract with some responsible person or persons, at a certain rate per cubical yard, or by hiring individuals per day; in general, it is the most saving mode to remove earth by contract; if this, upon full investigation, should appear to be the case, you will of course adopt it.

Second. It will be expected that, for any mechanical work to be performed, whether relatively to the fortifications, or the mounting of artillery, that you will obtain every article upon the best terms possible. This will be essential, for the sake of your own reputation, as it is not improbable that all the accounts respecting this business may hereafter be published. Besides which, the accounting officers of the treasury will rigidly examine every charge, and, if exorbitant, or not well vouched, they will make the necessary deductions.

Third. It is to be understood by you, that the requisition in writing upon you, by the engineer, or by the superintendent, authorized by the engineer for that purpose, will be essential in the passing your accounts. It is possible, however, that some other person than the engineer may hereafter be appointed to mount the cannon; in that case, he will exhibit his appointment to you before you furnish any supplies.

The sum contemplated for the port of _____ is not to be exceeded without some pressing reason. It will be necessary, therefore, at the time that the first moiety of the said sum should be expended, that you should enclose me an abstract of the articles for which it has been disbursed, together with a statement of the engineer or superintendent, of the proportion which the sum expended bears to the whole work, taking into consideration the purchase of any materials which are to serve for the general object.

The amount of the expenses for making new carriages for cannon, cannot now be ascertained; but the Secretary of the Treasury will place _____ dollars in your hands, to be appropriated to that object.

I am, &c.

H. KNOX.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 24, 1794.

SIR:

I request that you would, upon mature consideration, determine upon the quantity of ground which will be indispensably necessary for the accommodation of the fortifications of _____. You will please to report the said quantity in acres to _____, the agent at _____, in order that he may take the necessary measures for purchasing the same, and you will please, also, to make a duplicate report to this office.

Permit me to urge the season of the year, which is advancing, as a strong inducement to placing all the fortifications under your direction in a state of defence, and of completing them, as far as possible, with the funds which have been designated.

I am, &c.

H. KNOX.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1794.

SIR:

The estimates herein enclosed, relatively to the fortifications, is a copy of the one presented to the committee of Congress, and is presumed to have been contemplated in the law making the appropriations upon the subject. Some places, however, are mentioned in the law which are not contained in the estimate.

It will be necessary to appoint some man of character for integrity and intelligence in each of the places to be fortified, for the purpose of obtaining the labor and materials necessary for the fortifications. I presume the appointment of such persons will belong to your department, and, under this impression, I have conceived it proper, on my part, to draught a letter according to the purport of No. 2.

As it will be perceived that garrisons are contemplated, it will be necessary that some arrangement be also made for furnishing the rations and other necessary supplies in the Quartermaster's department.

You will decide upon the proportions of the sums for the fortifications, to be placed in the hands of the agent to be appointed. They ought to be sufficient to obtain every thing which shall be wanted, so that the works may not languish for want of the necessary means.

SIR:

The Congress of the United States having, by their act of the 9th of June, 1794, appropriated a further sum of thirty thousand dollars, in addition to the seventy-six thousand dollars heretofore granted for the purpose of fortifying certain ports and harbors in the United States, making together one hundred and six thousand dollars, I have to request you will be pleased to furnish me, as soon as convenient, with a memorandum of the manner in which the said sum of one hundred and six thousand dollars is to be apportioned among the several ports and harbors, designated to be fortified by the acts of Congress of the 20th March and 9th May, 1794, that I may be enabled to ascertain, with precision, what further sums remain to be remitted to the persons respectively appointed to disburse the moneys.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 9, 1794.

SIR:

Agreeably to your request of the 7th instant, I have the honor of transmitting you the sums to be expended upon the fortifications specified by the laws, the entire appropriation for which amounts to one hundred and six thousand dollars. The sums apportioned to the different places amount to one hundred and four thousand and twenty-five dollars and fifty-two cents, leaving a balance of one thousand nine hundred and seventy-four dollars and forty-eight cents, to be apportioned hereafter to such places as may be deemed necessary.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit you a copy of a circular letter to the several engineers employed for fortifying certain ports and harbors of the United States; and I beg leave to request that you will take such measures as you may deem proper for the purchase of such tracts of land at the places, respectively, as shall be designated by the engineers to the agents.

Secretary of War to the Comptroller of the Treasury.

October 16, 1794.

SIR:

I have the honor to represent to you, that it will be requisite to add to the sums heretofore apportioned for the fortifications of the following places, the sums herein specified:

Portland,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	900

The sums now requested may be considered as deducted from the sum of eight thousand seven hundred and forty-nine dollars and twenty-eight cents, heretofore apportioned to Boston, and which will not be expended this year, owing to some difficulties which have arisen on the part of the State Government to the fortifying of that harbor.

I request you will be pleased to direct the sums before mentioned to be transmitted to the agents of the said places, respectively.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 17, 1794.

SIR:

In reply to your letter of this date, I have the honor to inform you, that no general instructions have gone from this Department to the collectors, relative to the purchase of the lands on which fortifications might be erected, from an expectation that the information necessary for the government of the treasury would come in course through the channel designated in your letter to me of the 24th of July last.

The enclosed memorandum exhibits a view of all the cases in which cessions and purchases have been made, or measures taken to effect the object thereof. The treaty for the purchase of the land on which the fortifications are erecting at Baltimore is suspended for the present, on account of a very material difference in opinion with respect to the value of it.

I am, sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

A. HAMILTON.

The inhabitants of Marblehead have ceded to the United States the land on which the fortifications are erecting. Another piece of land adjoining thereto has, at the request of the engineer, been purchased from Russell Trevett, for two hundred and fifty dollars; to which sum, however, are to be added sixty dollars paid to a person to relinquish his right to the fishing flakes.

The inhabitants of Salem have ceded to the United States the land on which the fortifications are erecting. The Governor of Virginia has been authorized to purchase the land at Norfolk, provided the cost does not exceed one thousand dollars.

The collector at Baltimore has been directed to take measures for ascertaining the value of the land at Whetstone Point, near Baltimore, whereon the fortifications are erecting.

MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 29, 1794.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed to prepare a plan for the better organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States, made the following report:

That they are of opinion the plan for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, already adopted by law, may be made competent to all the purposes of an efficient militia, by remedying the difficulties and inconveniences which have occurred in the execution of the same.

That the principal difficulties and inconveniences which have occurred in the execution of the militia system, particularly respect the incompetent provisions for arming them, and for calling them forth to execute the laws of the United States, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

It appears to the committee, that the principal defects in the existing provisions for arming the militia, consist in the want of a competent source of supplying the arms; the want of some provision for furnishing persons with arms, who may be deemed unable to furnish themselves; and the want of adequate and uniform penalties to enforce a compliance with the requisitions of the existing militia laws.

The committee not having that part of this subject committed to them, which respects the calling forth of the militia, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," ought to be amended; and that further provision ought to be made, by law, for arming the militia of the United States, and for enforcing the execution of the existing militia laws, by adequate and uniform penalties.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 28, 1795.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was recommitted the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States, made the following report:

That, by an estimate of the Secretary of War, during the last session, the following sums were considered as sufficient to fortify the following ports and harbors, viz:

Portland, in the District of Maine,	-	-	-	$2,749 28

St. Mary's, }	-	-	-	-

The statements for Boston, and Wilmington, in Delaware, are not noted, in consequence of Castle William being held by the State of Massachusetts, and no proceeding having taken effect in respect to Wilmington. Alexandria is not estimated, and the committee are of opinion that it is not necessary now to complete the work. Annapolis stands by a particular act, and it is suggested no estimate may be made on that subject, as the President is already empowered to go on with the works, if he thinks necessary.

The committee are of opinion, that the following sums will be sufficient to complete the fortifications, agreeably to the original intention, viz:

Portland,	-	-	-	-	$1,000
Portsmouth,	-	-	-	-	1,000
Gloucester,	-	-	-	-	1,000

Charleston and Georgetown,	-	-	-	-	5,000
Savannah and St. Mary's,	-	-	-	-	3,000
					$46,500

Your committee, taking into view every circumstance connected with this subject, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a sum, not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, be appropriated for the purpose of completing the fortifications of certain ports and harbors in the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 12, 1795.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Report of the Secretary of War on the measures which have been pursued to obtain proper sites for Arsenals; which is respectfully submitted to the Senate of the United States:

It having been determined to erect one arsenal on the Potomac, and another in South Carolina, the latter in a situation to and from which water transportation would be afforded, and the former in the vicinity of a number of iron works, the necessary orders were given in the year 1794 for exploring both countries. The agent, employed on the former, reported in the same year in favor of a situation about twenty-five miles below the blue ridge, where a number of circumstances invited the establishment. In an undertaking, however, of such importance and permanency, it was deemed expedient to make another examination. This was done last Spring. The engineer employed, pursuant to his instructions, reported the situation of various places, where it would be practicable to erect the necessary works and magazines, with their respective advantages and disadvantages; and at what prices they could probably be obtained. These were all extremely high; and one far exceeded the whole appropriation for all the arsenals proposed to be erected. For this reason another place, comprehending several lots of land, had the preference; and the requisite negotiations were begun for making the purchases. Before these were concluded, the attention of the Executive was called to another situation on the Potomac, possessing, with some difficulties to be encountered, apparently many important advantages. The engineer was again instructed to examine this place, from whence he has lately returned. The American gentleman, well acquainted with the country, and who assisted him in this examination, was to have transmitted a survey of the place referred to, and of the adjacent waters on which the engineer's report would be completed. The survey has not yet been received, and the determination of the Executive is consequently suspended.

The engineer employed, for the like purpose, in South Carolina, made a report, which was received early in the last Summer. He had explored that part of the country to which his attention had been directed by the Executive. He also examined another. The latter, independent of its being in a more healthful situation, was deemed by him to possess some other advantages over the former. However, he proposed to visit the seat of Government, and personally explain his ideas of the subject. This visit was waited for, but not made; no decision has, consequently, been taken on his report.

The prices of lands and mill seats, (for the latter must be comprehended in the plan of an arsenal,) so far exceeded those upon which the calculations were made, when the plan of erecting arsenals was projected, and rose so rapidly soon after, it is now found that the whole appropriation, for the three or four arsenals which the Executive was authorised by law to erect, would be inadequate for a single new establishment. Hence, the principal object, in the measures pursued during the last summer, was to ascertain and secure the most eligible site on the Potomac, where magazines could be erected, and certain military stores be collected and safely deposited; and where, afterwards, the works necessary, in the formation of all the implements of war, might be erected, as the requisite funds could be provided.

In a country where such establishments are unknown, and where the actual state of things admits of a suspension of some of them, consistently with the public safety, it would seem expedient to make an experiment with one in a central position. The obvious principles of economy recommend this caution; and the avoiding of defects likely to appear in a first attempt, and the probability of solid improvements, which experience would suggest, in a second, strongly enforce it.

Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts, was at once fixed on as a proper situation for the arsenal to be established in the eastern division of the States. Magazines, for military stores, had been formerly erected at that place. Some additional buildings have been made, and a number of workmen collected for the purpose of repairing and manufacturing small arms. The former has been executed, and the latter commenced.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, December 12, 1795.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Report of the Secretary of War on the measures which have been taken to replenish the magazines with military stores.

In respect to some of the most essential articles, the stock on hand is respectable; and, as to others, the magazines are now not ill supplied.

A contract has been made for a large quantity of saltpetre; and probably it is now on its way from India. This important article may, however, be obtained in the Western parts of the United States. The fact is ascertained. Forty or fifty tons have been brought from those parts to Philadelphia for sale, and it is said that several hundred tons might be procured, in the same way, in the course of the next summer, if needed.

To increase the stock of small arms, and to render serviceable those already in the public stores, two sets of armorers have been employed, to wit: at Springfield, Massachusetts, and at New London, in Virginia, in repairing arms, and preparing to manufacture the most essential parts of muskets; and some specimens have been produced which prove their capacity to equal, in that article, the manufacture of any country in the world. All the arms in the magazines in Philadelphia have been repaired, with some thousands at West Point, where the residue are now repairing.

In addition to these sources of supply, besides two thousand rifles which have been purchased, contracts have been made, and are executing, for seven thousand muskets, to be manufactured in the United States. The present period may be deemed an unfavorable one to carry on such manufactures, on account of the high price of labor; nevertheless, it seemed important to secure the services of the manufacturers, when they might be of the highest necessity, by continuing to furnish them employment. Such muskets as are manufactured are after the model of the French arms, which compose, by far, the greatest part of those in our magazines. For this reason, and because they are preferable to those of any other nation known in the United States, it was apparently inexpedient to make an importation of arms from Europe; seeing a supply was not to be expected from France, and the situation of the United States not rendering the measure of an immediate importation indispensable.

The casting of cannon has not been attended, hitherto, with the expected success. The foundries which formerly succeeded very well in the casting of small guns, were not well adapted to the casting of 24 and 32 pounders. A French gentleman, of some knowledge and experience in cannon foundries, has lately been employed to amend the process of casting, and to improve the machinery for boring; and there is room to hope that his projected improvements will be realized. Nevertheless, in an undertaking so important, and, at the same time, so expensive, it was desirable to obtain, if possible, a complete cannon foundry; and, from the information received, it seemed probable that one might be procured from one of the first foundries in Europe. Measures, for that purpose, have accordingly been taken.

All which is respectfully submitted to the Senate of the United States.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR, JANUARY 18, 1796.

State of the Fortifications of the United States.

WAR OFFICE, January 16th, 1796.

PORTLAND, in the District of Maine.—The works consist of a fort, a citadel, a battery for ten pieces of cannon, an artillery store, a guard house, an air furnace for heating shot, and a covered way from the fort to the battery.

The works are substantially executed, excepting the covered way; to complete this, the earth on the spot being of a bad quality, with the necessary supports of stones and sods, is estimated at four hundred dollars. Levelling the earth round the works, fencing the land pertaining to them, a pump for the well, painting the wood work, and rendering the whole perfectly complete, the estimate is four hundred and seventy-one dollars, in the whole eight hundred and seventy-one dollars.

PORTSMOUTH, New Hampshire.—The works consist of a fort, a citadel, an artillery store, and a reverberatory furnace. These are all completed, excepting a little carpenters' work, suspended to let the wood season, and which may cost about fifty dollars. But a small and unforeseen expense must be incurred, for a drain to carry the water from the magazine, and may cost one hundred dollars.

GLOUCESTER, (Cape Ann.)—The works consist of a battery and a citadel. These are completed. But to enclose the fort, towards the town, the cost is estimated at one thousand four hundred dollars. This, however, may be postponed till circumstances require it to be done.

SALEM.—The works, consisting of a fort and citadel, have been erected. A gate remains to be made, and some repairs to the walls.

MARBLEHEAD.—A battery and a citadel have been erected. Any other works may be suspended until circumstances shall change.

NEWPORT, in Rhode Island.—For the defence of this harbor there have been erected, on Goat Island, a fort, a citadel, and an air furnace. The excellency and importance of this harbor, in time of war, recommend a further expenditure, to render the defence complete. To finish the fort, erect an artillery store, and make a covered way round it, as in a regular fortification, the expense is estimated at about six thousand dollars.

There have also been erected a citadel on Tammany Hill, back of the town of Newport, for the protection of its inhabitants, and a battery and guard house, at Howland's Ferry, at the northern end of the island, to keep open a communication with the main, in case of an invasion. But, to secure effectually this communication, a citadel should be erected on Butts' Hill, that position commanding Howland's Ferry and Bristol Ferry. The cost of it is estimated at eighteen hundred dollars.

NEW LONDON.—The works consist of a fort and citadel, on the Groton side of the harbor, and of a fort, a citadel, and an air furnace, on the New London side. They remain incomplete. Under present circumstances, a small expenditure may be proper, merely to preserve what has been done.

NEW YORK.—Governor's Island has been fortified with a fort made of earth, and two batteries under its protection, partly lined with brick masonry, two air furnaces, a large powder magazine, and a barrack for the garrison; the whole completed.

PHILADELPHIA.—A large pier, as the foundation for a battery, on a sand bar, opposite Mud Island, to make a cross fire, has been completed. A fort, on Mud Island, is about half done, and a citadel has been erected to complete the fort, and on a plan much more circumscribed than was at first projected. The expense is estimated at fifteen thousand dollars.

WILMINGTON, in the Delaware State.—Nothing has been done. The project of erecting a fort there has been abandoned as useless.

BALTIMORE.—A battery and barracks have been constructed, and some guns are mounted.

ANNAPOLIS.—Some progress had been made in the construction of a fort and battery, and a barrack has been erected. But an examination of the works by an engineer, other than the one first employed, produced an unfavorable report of the plan of the works; and, under actual circumstances, induced a relinquishment of them.

A similar report as to the plan and situation of the work at ALEXANDRIA, induced a like relinquishment.

NORFOLK.—Two forts, intended to cross their fire, are erected on the opposite sides of the harbor. The one on the Norfolk side, with barracks and a powder magazine, is completed. The other, Fort Nelson, on the Portsmouth side, is very far advanced, and a powder magazine has been erected. The principal work remaining to be done is the opening of seven embrasures, completing one ditch of three hundred and sixty feet long, cutting another eleven hundred feet long, completing the glacis, and removing the earth from within side of the fort, where it is two feet and an half too high. The expense of doing this, and completing the fortification, may be estimated at five thousand dollars.

OCRACOKE, in North Carolina.—The defence proposed was, to erect a fort on Becon Island. The foundation was laid in 1794. The situation is so far removed (about ninety miles) from any inhabitants, and so exposes any works to injuries from storms, that nothing but an impending or actual war would seem to authorize the construction of a fort there, and furnishing it with a proper garrison.

WILMINGTON, in North Carolina.—The battery, on the whole front of the fort, has been completed, and a barrack and powder magazine have been erected.

GEORGETOWN, South Carolina.—A battery was begun, and materials collected, when the work was suspended, the owner of the land previously desiring to ascertain the terms on which it was to be occupied, for the fortification and for the road of communication with it. The unhealthiness of the situation and other circumstances authorize an abandonment of the work until war, actual or impending, shall require it to be resumed.

CHARLESTON, South Carolina.—The work planned for Sullivan's Island, of which the foundation only was laid in 1794, being on a scale supposed too extensive for the funds destined to this service, was directed to be left as it was. For the same reason, a new work, proposed by the engineer, on a point on the opposite side of the harbor from Fort Johnston, was not attempted. A battery has been erected in the town, by the mechanics.

There remained only Fort Johnston, on which directions were given to make such repairs as would preserve the works already constructed, and render them serviceable. The engineer omitted the work.

The officer in command at the fort has undertaken to make the necessary repairs of the works and barracks, and his intelligence and experience leave no room to doubt but these will be done.

SAVANNAH, in Georgia.—The work consists of a battery, at present destined only for six guns, made of timber filled with earth, and enclosed behind with pickets, with a guard house for the garrison, which were in train to be completed early the last autumn.

ST. MARY'S, in Georgia.—The work consists of a battery made of timbers filled with earth, and enclosed with pickets. By the personal report of the superintendent it must have been completed.

GENERAL REMARK.—The few ports of the highest importance to the commerce of the United States, in situations to demand, for their security, fortifications of such kind and extent as cannot suddenly be erected, prudence may require to have fortified, in time of peace, and with durable materials.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 25, 1796.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the present military establishment of the United States, made the following report:

That, in their opinion, the events which have changed, and may be expected still further to change, the relative situations of our frontiers, render a review of the military establishment at this time expedient. It is the opinion of the committee, that the force to be provided for the defensive protection of the frontiers, need not be so great as what had been contemplated for carrying on the war against the different tribes of hostile Indians, and which is the basis of the present military establishment.

By the last act on this subject, of March 3d, 1795, the military force of the United States is to be composed of the corps of artilleryists and engineers, to consist of, 992 non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and of a legion to consist of 4,800 non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians. Of these there will be still, in actual service, on the first of July next three thousand and four, which the committee suppose will be sufficient to be continued as the present military establishment; they therefore recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That these ought to consist of the corps of artilleryists and engineers, as established by the act of the 9th of May, 1794, and of four regiments of infantry, of eight companies each.

Resolved, That there be one Brigadier General, five Lieutenant Colonel Commandants, eleven Majors, one Brigade Quartermaster, and company officers, according to the rules and regulations for the discipline of the troops of the United States.

Colonel Pickering presents his respects to Mr. Baldwin, with the extract of a letter from Governor Blount, expressing an opinion connected with some ideas Colonel P. has suggested relative to the military establishment.

February 4, 1796.

Extract of a letter from Governor William Blount to the Secretary of War, dated

"KNOXVILLE, November 2d, 1795.

"Peace now actually exists between the United States and the Indian tribes, and, in my opinion, may be preserved by the establishment of strong military posts of regular troops upon the frontiers, at proper places, with cavalry of the same description, to patrol between them.

"I do not recommend posts for the preservation of peace, from any inclination that I at present discover or suspect in either party to disturb it; but peace between frontier people and Indians, when left unrestrained by the hand of Government, rests upon so many events, trivial in themselves, that, in my judgment, Government will consult its true interest in taking immediate measures to guard against such as may happen."

A true abstract from the original, remaining in the War Office.

N. JONES, Clerk.

Objects of the Military Establishment of the United States.

1st. To occupy the posts already established on the line between the United States and Canada, from Lake Champlain to Michillimackinack. To appear respectable in the eyes of our British neighbors, the force with which we take possession of the posts should not be materially less than that with which they now occupy them. This measure is also important in relation to the Indians, on whom first impressions may have very beneficial effects.

2d. To occupy the posts established, and to be established, agreeably to the treaty lately concluded with the Indians, northwest of the Ohio; including also those from Pittsburg to Presque Isle.

3d. The treaty concluded with Spain, must, doubtless, give us the posts they now occupy at the Chickasaw bluff and the Natchez, which we must garrison. They will be proper stations for opening the trade with the Chickasaws and Choctaws, and very convenient stations to our citizens navigating the Mississippi.

4. To preserve peace between the southern Indians and the frontier citizens, from the Cumberland to St. Mary's, by restraining the latter from aggressions, particularly by settling on Indian lands.

5th. To accomplish the same object, northwest of the Ohio; with the addition of preserving the Indian territory, and the proper lands of the United States, from intrusions, and to remove the actual intruders; for they have already manifested their rapacity in seizing and possessing the public lands.

6th. To garrison the most important fortifications on the sea coast. The smaller ones in time of peace may be taken care of, each by an individual, such as an invalid, or other poor citizen, at a very small expense.

In applying the military force to these objects, I have thrown the posts to be occupied into divisions, in each of which there will be a principal station for the ordinary residence of the commandant of the division. One battalion will occupy one of these divisions, and a sub-legion three of them. The lieutenant colonel will take a station the most convenient for superintending his sub-legion. A general officer will find abundant employment in visiting and regulating all the posts.

Hence it will seem that I am of opinion, that the present form of our military establishment should be preserved, for 1st. A military force, not much short of that which now exists, must always be kept up, even in time of peace, in order to preserve peace with the Indians, and to protect theirs, and the public lands.

2d. Though detached so far from Europe, yet having for our neighbors the subjects of two European powers, and our extended and extending commerce making all the maritime powers of Europe in some sense our neighbors, we cannot expect for ever to escape from war with some of them. In this expectation, will it not be highly important to maintain a military arrangement which shall be a model, and furnish instructors, for all the additional corps, which a war shall compel us to form?

3d. Beyond question, the military posts we must occupy, on our vast frontiers, will be numerous, though the garrison will be small. But if such remote stations are established with an entire independence of each other, and without superior commanding officers to inspect and regulate them, every species of negligence and abuse may be expected to be indulged, and practised, in many of them, thus defeating the objects of their establishment. And as such visits will frequently be requisite, the higher officers, in their respective divisions, will be the proper inspectors. A just subordination being thus maintained, the commandants of posts will regularly be responsible, and report the condition of their commands to their immediate superiors, respectively; these to their respective superior inspecting officers; and the latter to the commanding general, who will in one view present the state of the military forces entire, and of the posts they occupy, to the supreme Executive of the United States.

It is very true, that the number of troops, now on foot, might be commanded by fewer officers; all the infantry and riflemen being only about equal to the sub-legions. If, then, the other two sub-legions were reduced, it would produce a saving for pay, subsistence, and forage for the officers, of about twenty thousand dollars a year. This, doubtless, merits attention; but, in the present moment, the reduction would seem to me inexpedient—

1st. Because the pacific arrangements entered into with Great Britain, and those believed to be formed with Spain, remain to be carried into effect.

2d. Because we do not yet know what will be the issue of fresh hostilities with the Creeks; they may bring on a general war with that nation, and alone demand a military force equal to our whole establishment.

For these reasons, I would submit to the committee, whether it is not prudent to suspend any decision on the military establishment to a later period in the season? Probably in a month or two, every fact that has relation to the two neighboring powers, and to the Creeks, will be ascertained in such a manner as to leave no further room for hesitation in regard to the extent of our military establishment. By inspecting the return, in the hands of the committee, they will perceive that the troops will be reducing, by the mere expiration of their enlistment, quite as fast as it will be prudent to discharge them.

If the committee shall think proper to suspend their report, they will have the advantage of the information that may be derived from General Wayne, (whose arrival is daily expected,) particularly in regard to the posts which it will be expedient to occupy.

The corps of artificers and engineers appears to be an important establishment. To become skilful in either branch of their profession, will require long attention, study, and practice; and because they can now acquire the knowledge of these arts advantageously only from the foreign officers, who have been appointed with a special reference to this object, it will be important to keep the corps together for the present, as far as the necessary actual service will permit. Its principal station may then become a school for the purpose mentioned. To render this school more complete, provision is wanting for a geographical engineer and draughtsman. Such a one may now be retained for the establishment of a captain.

WAR OFFICE, March 14, 1796.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit to the committee on the military establishment, the thoughts that have occurred to me on the questions respecting which they seemed to desire my opinion.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JAMES M'HENRY.

ADM. BALDWIN, Esq.

Thoughts of the Secretary of War on the following questions, viz.:

First. Ought the military force of the United States to be diminished?

Second. Can any saving be made in the Quartermaster's department?

Third. Ought a provision to be made for the appointment of a Judge Advocate to the establishment?

First. Ought the military force of the United States to be diminished?

The necessity for any military establishment seems to rest principally upon the following considerations, by which this question may be tested: 1st. As a military establishment secures from, or enables the United States to repel, insult and invasion, and maintain her dignity. 2d. As it counteracts the influence of the force kept up by Great Britain and Spain, over our northern and western boundaries, as the same applies to excite or keep alive Indian hostilities. 3d. As it preserves a model and school for an army, and experienced officers to form it, in case of war. 4th. From the sense of the inadequacy of a militia to answer those several purposes, without the aid of a regular force.

Declining a more detailed view of these general considerations, it will be taken for granted, that one or all of them render a certain military establishment essential to the interests and peace of the Union. The only point then that remains to be settled, is the quantum of force necessary to be kept up, so as to avoid useless expense, and at the same time secure the objects it contemplates.

To determine upon this force, or, rather, to enable one to make up an opinion respecting it, reference must be had to the force likely to be kept up by Great Britain and Spain, near to our boundaries. The force which they have at present in these quarters, may be stated in gross, and without aiming at precision, to be greater than the present effective force of the United States; while several reasons concur to induce a belief, that neither of these nations will contract it on evacuating the posts which they occupy within our limits. To mention some of them:

1st. Great Britain may wish, at least, not to hazard the loss of the influence she may possess over the northern Indians. She may therefore think, that to lessen her force in Canada, on the event of the delivery of the posts, (however desirous she might be to transfer it to the West Indies,) would be to incur its loss.

2d. Great Britain may also deem it indispensable to occupy other posts as near as may be to those to be evacuated, with a view to the preservation of this influence and security of the colony.

3d. Spain, like Great Britain, having posts to deliver to the United States, may, with similar views, follow the same course as Great Britain. She may also feel yet stronger motives for keeping up her present force, or even for increasing it, resulting from an apprehension that the treaty, lately negotiated with the United States, may approximate our citizens too near to her possessions.

4th. When we advert to the importance which Great Britain may give to Canada, as it respects her West India islands, as it forms a link in the great chain of her dependencies, and as it may weigh in her general system of power, it is further to be presumed, that she will, at all times, endeavor to maintain force there, equivalent, at least, to the present.

These considerations alone strongly indicate the necessity of a military force, competent to counteract that maintained by Great Britain and Spain, as to all those internal objects to which it may be applied. For such considerations, therefore, and the reasons assigned by the late Secretary of War, in his communication of the third of February, ultimo, it is thought that it will not be advisable to reduce the establishment of the United States below its present effective force. But, inasmuch as things have not yet taken their settled form, and as that form can only be guessed at, no absolute arrangement can be predicted in the premises. Perhaps, all circumstances considered, it would be the safest course of proceeding to leave the establishment as it stands for the present, with a discretion in the President to reduce the battalions to the effective number of privates.

2d. Can any saving be made in the Quartermaster's department?

If the western posts are to be taken possession of, the expense for transporting the troops, stores, artillery, and provisions, at the season in which they must be moved, will be very considerable. The expenses of furnishing the different posts, with provisions and other supplies, will be greater this year, than the last, on account of the rise in flour, &c. to which may be added, the difference in expense between a land and water transport, should it be found impracticable to contract in time to make use of the latter. The water transport, for example, from Pittsburg to the Miami of the lake, generally fails about the middle of May, and cannot, communibus annis, be used again till October. On the whole, no correct estimate can be formed, at this moment, on this subject.

3d. Ought a provision to be made for the appointment of a Judge Advocate to the establishment?

Considering what may be the distance, between the several posts, on a final arrangement, how inconvenient it must be for a Judge Advocate to travel, from one to another, as cases occur to require his presence, and the hardships that individuals must experience, by having their trial delayed till he could attend: it is, therefore, thought best not to decide the question till it can be further examined, or the necessity for such provision becomes more apparent.

JAMES McHENRY, Secretary of War.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 9, 1796.

Mr. WILLIAM LYMAN, from the committee appointed to take into consideration the state of the fortifications of our harbors; and the measures which have been pursued for obtaining proper sites for arsenals, and for replenishing our magazines with military stores; and to report whether any, and what, further measures are necessary respecting the same, made the following report:

That it appears from the report of the Secretary of War, referred to the committee, that measures are now pursuing by the executive for obtaining proper sites for arsenals, and for replenishing our magazines with military stores; but that the result thereof is not ascertained; the progress, however, is such as to warrant a belief, that the complete accomplishment of those objects will soon be effected. It is, therefore, the opinion of the committee, that no further legislative provision, relative thereto, is necessary at this time.

From the view of the present state of the fortifications of our harbors, exhibited in the report of the Secretary of War, the committee are induced to believe, that some further expenditures will be expedient to perfect and secure the works already constructed; otherwise, in some instances, they might be useless, and in many, would probably be exposed to very sudden decay and destruction; nevertheless, it does not appear to the committee to be necessary to extend the provisions for this object, any further, at the present time, as by a letter and statement from the secretary, to the committee, which accompany this report, there appears to be a very considerable sum of the former appropriations now unexpended.

These conclusions of the committee are formed without reference to the fortifications in the harbor of New York. At that place, the works have been laid out upon a plan very extensive, constructed with durable materials, and principally under the direction of the Government, and at the expense of that State. Although it does not appear to have been contemplated by the United States to fortify any harbor so extensively, and in a manner so expensive, it may, notwithstanding, be deserving their attention to consider how far the undertaking is entitled to their encouragement and support. The committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of _____ dollars be appropriated and paid out of any moneys in the treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing and securing the fortifications in the harbor of New-York.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 17, 1796.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a statement of the sums appropriated for fortifying the harbors of the United States, of the sums expended at the respective places, and of the balance on hand. But there are some claims of the agents, for moneys advanced, which must be reimbursed; they may, perhaps, amount to six or eight thousand dollars.

In the course of the year 1795, the State of Pennsylvania ceded to the United States the island in the river Delaware, called Mud Island, where the fortifications are begun. The State, at the same time, ceded certain pieces of land at Presque Isle, for the purpose of being fortified, and for the accommodation of public vessels that might be used on Lake Erie: And,

A few acres of land, where the fortifications have been begun, for the defence of Baltimore, have been purchased.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 10, 1797.

MR. WILLIAM LYMAN, from the committee appointed to inquire into the factual state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States, and whether any, and what, further provision is necessary to be made on that subject, made the following report:

That the report from the Department of War to Congress, the twentieth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, will enable the House to form an opinion of the number and state of the forts and harbors at the period to which it refers.

The alterations in those forts, that have taken place since that period, consist chiefly in 'depredations made by time on such of them as have not been garrisoned, and in such repairs and additions as could be made by the garrisons where troops have been stationed, or that were wanting to their accommodation.

In the former description are comprehended, the works at Portland, in the district of Maine; Portsmouth, New Hampshire; Gloucester, Salem, and Marblehead, Massachusetts; Newport, Rhode Island; New London, Connecticut; and Savannah and Point Petre, in Georgia.

In the latter description are comprised, the defences at Governor's Island, New York; Mud Island, Philadelphia; Whetstone Point, Baltimore; Norfolk, Virginia; Wilmington, North Carolina; and Fort Johnston, Charleston, South Carolina.

The forts which have been without troops, must be presumed to have suffered considerable injury by time alone, and will require, if the circumstances of the military establishment and frontiers should not admit of their being garrisoned, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, about three thousand five hundred dollars annually, to pay persons to live in and superintend them, and for certain repairs necessary to prevent them from becoming perfectly useless.

The forts that are garrisoned have been kept in repair, so far as the force stationed in them permitted; but it will require an additional grant of money to finish some necessary buildings, and complete certain works, indispensable to their defence and preservation.

The committee find, that, by an estimate from the Department of War, accompanying this report, it appears that the further sum of twenty-three thousand three hundred and ninety-four dollars and fifty-five cents, in addition to former appropriations, is necessary to be provided for the purposes aforesaid.

The committee further report, that they have received, from the board of commissioners, and the engineer for fortifying the port and harbor of New York, sundry statements relative to the defence of that place, which they beg leave to lay before the House.

No. 1. is a description of the fortifications erected on Governor's, Bedloe's, and Oyster Islands; what further is necessary to the completion thereof; with an estimate of the probable expense.

No. 2. A summary statement of the probable expenditures necessary for the construction of fortifications for the defence of New York.

No. 3. contains an explanation of, with observations upon, the several proposed plans for the complete defence of New York.

NOTE.—Papers, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, were returned to the Secretary of War, May 31, 1797, and are not now to be found.

OBJECTIONS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO AN ACT TO REORGANIZE THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 28, 1797.

UNITED STATES, February 28, 1797.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Having maturely considered the bill to alter and amend an act, entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States," which was presented to me on the twenty-second day of this month, I now return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with my objections.

First. If the bill passes into a law, the two companies of light dragoons will be, from that moment, legally out of service, though they will afterwards continue actually in service; and for their services, during this interval, namely, from the time of legal to the time of actual discharge, it will not be lawful to pay them, unless some future provision be made by law. Though they may be discharged at the pleasure of Congress, in justice they ought to receive their pay, not only to the time of passing the law, but, at least, to the time of their actual discharge.

Secondly. It will be inconvenient and injurious to the public to dismiss the light dragoons, as soon as notice of the law can be conveyed to them, one of the companies having been lately destined to a necessary and important service.

Thirdly. The companies of light dragoons consist of one hundred and twenty-six non-commissioned officers and privates, who are bound to serve as dismounted dragoons when ordered so to do. They have received, in bounties, about two thousand dollars: one of them is completely equipped, and above half of the non-commissioned officers and privates have yet to serve more than one third of the time of their enlistment; and besides, there will, in the course of the year, be a considerable deficiency in the complement of infantry intended to be continued. Under these circumstances, to discharge the dragoons does not seem to comport with economy.

Fourthly. It is generally agreed that some cavalry, either militia or regular, will be necessary; and, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, it is my opinion that the latter will be less expensive and more useful than the former, in preserving peace between the frontier settlers and the Indians; and, therefore, a part of the military establishment should consist of cavalry.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

"An act to alter and amend an act, entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That the third section of the act passed the thirtieth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States," together with all other parts thereof, which relate to provision made for the Major General and his staff, be repealed; and that all such parts of the said act which relate to the light dragoons, together with so much of the twenty-third section of the said act as may be construed to affect the Brigadier, and the whole of the eleventh section of the said act be, and are hereby, repealed.

"And be it further enacted: That there shall be one Brigadier General, who may choose his Brigade Major and inspector, from the captains and subalterns in the line, (to each of whom there shall be allowed the monthly pay of twenty-five dollars, in addition to his pay in the line, and two rations extraordinary per day; and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, to ten dollars per month, in lieu thereof.) That there shall be one Brigade Quartermaster, one Brigade Paymaster, and one Judge Advocate, who shall be taken from the commissioned officers of the line, and each of whom shall be entitled to receive two rations extra per day, and twenty-five dollars per month, in addition to his pay in the line; and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, to ten dollars per month, in lieu thereof.

"And be it further enacted: That, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, the monthly pay of the Lieutenants shall be thirty dollars, and that of the Ensign twenty-five dollars; that to the Brigadier, while Commander-in-Chief, and to each officer, while commanding a separate post, there shall be allowed twice the number of rations to which they would otherwise be entitled.

"And be it further enacted: That the Majors be entitled to receive four rations per day for their subsistence.

"And be it further enacted: That to each commissioned officer who may have been deranged under the act, "to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States," or who may be deranged under the present act, there shall be paid one hundred dollars.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 10, 1797.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, from the committee appointed to bring in a bill for making further provision for the fortification of the ports and harbors of the United States, made the following report:

That no material alterations have taken place since the last session, in the state of the fortifications on the sea coast of the United States, as appears from a letter addressed to the committee of the Senate, on this subject, by the Secretary of War, a copy whereof is herunto annexed, and that, from verbal information received from the said officer, it appears that only three thousand dollars, or thereabouts, of the sum appropriated in the last session, has been expended, leaving a balance of about twenty-one thousand dollars unexpended.

And your committee further report: That, from an estimate, herunto also annexed, made by the Secretary of War, it appears that an additional appropriation will be requisite for completing the fortifications therein enumerated, of two hundred thousand dollars.

WAR OFFICE, 3d June, 1797.

SIR:

The committee of the Senate will find, in the annexed copy of a letter from the Secretary of War to a committee of the House of Representatives, and in the report it refers to, the state of the fortifications which have been erected on the seaboard, subsequent to the act of Congress of the 29th of March, 1794. Since the date of that letter, those forts have undergone very few repairs or alterations, that have not been made by their garrisons, except some at Fort Johnston, South Carolina, and to prevent the works there from being rendered useless by the encroachments of the sea.

You will also find, in the report of my predecessor, that above forty-six thousand dollars were thought requisite to complete certain of the defences mentioned in his report.

Will an appropriation be necessary at this juncture, and what particular ports stand most in need of immediate attention? It will, perhaps, be best to answer to these questions generally, as preserving to the Department of War more liberty to accommodate the disposal of an appropriation, according to exigencies and circumstances. As to the first, I conceive that about two hundred thousand dollars should be granted for the sea board fortifications. As to the second, the ports from New York to St. Mary's, (Georgia,) are those which stand in most need of immediate attention, more especially, in certain points of view, those on the southerly part of the line.

It is, however, to be observed, that the mere augmentation, or improving the forts in that quarter, will be of little utility, without the existence of regular troops to garrison them. These two objects, therefore, ought to be considered as inseparably united.

Upon the whole, I do not consider any other provision on the subject of our maritime fortifications, necessary at this time, than an appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES McHENRY.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of War, to William Lyman, Esq. dated

WAR OFFICE, January 10, 1797.

SIR:

The report from the Department of War, to Congress, dated the 20th day of January, 1796, will enable the committee to form an opinion of the number and state of the forts and harbors, at the period to which it refers.

The alterations in those forts, that have taken place since that period, consist, chiefly, in depredations made by time, on such of them as have not been garrisoned; and in such repairs, and additions, as could be made by the garrisons where troops have been stationed, or that were wanting to their accommodation. In the former description are comprehended, the works at Portland, in the District of Maine; Portsmouth, in New Hampshire; Gloucester, Cape Ann, Salem, Marblehead, Massachusetts; Newport, Rhode Island; New London, Connecticut; and Savannah, and Point Petre, Georgia.

In the latter description are comprised, the defences at Governor's Island, New York; Mud Island, Philadelphia; Whetstone Point, Baltimore; Norfolk, Virginia; Wilmington, North Carolina; and Fort Johnston, Charleston, South Carolina.

The forts which have been without troops, must be presumed to have suffered considerable injury from time alone, and will require, if the circumstances of the military establishment and frontiers should not admit of their being garrisoned, about three thousand five hundred dollars, annually, to pay persons to live in it, and superintend them, and for certain repairs necessary to prevent them from being perfectly useless.

The forts that are garrisoned have been kept in repairs, so far as the force stationed in them permitted; but it will require an additional grant of money to finish some necessary buildings, and complete certain works, indispensable to their defence and preservation.

I have subjoined an estimate of the expense which may probably be required for the before recited purposes, during the present year, and the balance, stated by the treasurer to be unexpended, of former appropriations.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES McHENRY.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 8, 1798.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's speech, which relates to the protection of commerce, and the defence of the country, further reported in part:

That, considering the increasing dangers which threaten the peace and security of the United States, and to which their extensive sea coast, and their domestic as well as foreign commerce, are alarmingly exposed, the necessary provisions of a maritime defence ought to receive the earnest and immediate attention of Congress; and especially recommend a concurrence, without delay, in the resolutions now before the House of Representatives, reported to them on the twelfth day of January last.

The committee further report, that, a considerable sum remains unexpended of the sums heretofore appropriated for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, as appears by the statement from the Department of War, exhibited herewith; and that, in the opinion of the committee, a further appropriation, and a more vigorous regard to this important object, has become immediately necessary.

They further report, that in the view which, on several occasions, this committee have taken of the subject of providing a naval armament, they have not failed to observe the apparently enormous expenses, and unaccountable delays, which have attended every attempt of this kind. It has appeared to them that a better economy might be introduced in this branch of the public expenditure, by establishing, in the War Department, some officer who should be employed in the immediate superintendance of the naval concerns of the United States.

The Department of War, as at present established, is unsuitable to this purpose, especially considering its stationary situation, and how much it is occupied by numerous cares of a nature very different.

On these subjects, they recommend the following resolutions to be adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the sum of _____, in addition to the sum of _____, remaining unexpended of former appropriations, be appropriated to fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States.

Resolved, That there be established in the Department of War, a Commissioner of Marine, who shall have charge of the construction, equipment, and supplies of the public vessels of the United States, and all other matters relating to their naval concerns, which shall be entrusted to him, according to law.

WAR OFFICE, 27th February, 1798.

SIR:

The committee, to whom was referred "so much of the President's speech as relates to the protection of commerce, and the defence of the country," desire to know the amount of the moneys expended since the last session of Congress, on the maritime fortifications, and whether, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, any further appropriation is required for the same object. The following information and remarks are, therefore, respectfully submitted.

That there remained unexpended of preceding appropriations for maritime fortifications, on the 6th of June, 1797,	-	-	-	-	-	$22,065 58

Appropriation of June 23, 1797,	-	-	-	-	-	115,000 00
						$137,065 58

That of this sum there has been expended, viz:

At Mud Island,	-	-	-	-	-	$23,640 87
Baltimore,	-	-	-	-	-	188 93
Charleston,	-	-	-	-	-	9,978 00
Portsmouth, N. H. (balance of account)	-	-	-	-	-	488 46
Newbern, (on account of balance)	-	-	-	-	-	800 00
Norfolk, (balance of account)	-	-	-	-	-	266 50
St. Mary's, Georgia, do.	-	-	-	-	-	4,018 89
						$39,381 65
Balance unexpended the 27th February, 1797.	-	-	-	-	-	97,683 93
						$137,065 58

The committee will perceive, that the principal sum expended since the last session of Congress, has been upon Fort Mifflin, in the State of Pennsylvania. This fortress, from several considerations, seemed entitled to particular attention. The ground on which it stands, and necessary to it, has been ceded to the United States. The works, as far as they have been erected, were composed of good materials, and put together in such a manner as to promise long duration and utility. An experiment had likewise shown where the works were most vulnerable, and that this fortress may be rendered competent, with certain auxiliary works, to afford essential protection to an important commercial city, against the operations of a powerful naval armament. It has, therefore, been deemed proper, under the trust committed to me by the President, to contemplate completing this fortress as expeditiously as possible.

The Secretary has suggested, on a former reference, that, to derive real advantage from any considerable expenditure of money for completing the seaboard fortresses, the military establishment should be such as to admit of their being occupied by garrisons equal to keeping them in a tenable situation, and to the preservation of their stores and artillery. It is certain that this cannot be done by militia, unless when called into actual service, and that no part of the regular force, employed on the Western frontiers, can be transferred from thence for such purposes, without endangering the peace of the Union, and opening the way, in that quarter, to the immediate execution of projects and enterprises, contrary to law and treaties, and subversive of all order and government. It is but too evident, also, that the course of things and circumstances, peculiar to the frontiers, shuts out any well founded expectation, that we have approached near to the time when the military force may be safely diminished or withdrawn.

Independent, therefore, of considerations resulting from our present situation, with respect to foreign nations, it would appear necessary and proper, that the seaboard fortifications should be generally improved, and this defence of our country rendered respectable, and, also, that the army should be proportionably augmented. A regard to ultimate economy will require, that such of the fortifications as may be always important to the general defence, should be constructed, like fort Mifflin, of the most durable materials.

It may be proper to mention, that, besides the want of men to garrison these forts, there is another difficulty which it is desirable should be removed. But few of the States have made cessions of land, on which forts have been, or ought to be, erected, for the protection of their harbors; a circumstance calculated to impede such undertakings, and embarrass the intentions of government to provide for their defence. Neither is it known to the Secretary that any of the States which were found indebted to the United States, on a settlement of the accounts between them and the respective States, have thought of availing themselves of the third section of the "act to provide for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States," passed the 23d June, 1797.

The committee will perceive, that many good causes have prevented a greater expenditure of the appropriations, and that while these continued to exist, they must interrupt the completion of our maritime defence by fortifications.

With respect to the last inquiry of the committee, a full consideration of all circumstances induces the Secretary to an opinion, that a further appropriation should be made, to be in readiness, and commensurate to meet such a state of things as may require our ports and harbors to be promptly and completely fortified, whether proper sites be ceded or not by the States more immediately concerned.

With great respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES McHENRY.

FORTIFICATIONS, MUNITIONS, AND INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 9, 1798.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee on that part of the President's speech, which regards the protection of commerce, and the defence of the country, further reported:

That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States to erect fortifications in such ports and places, near the sea coast, as, in his judgment, shall be requisite, and advantageous, for the common defence.

That a considerable addition is requisite to be made to the corps of artillerists and engineers already established, to be employed in the several fortifications which have been, and which shall be, erected on or near the sea coast.

That a large supply of cannon, arms, and ammunition, is necessary to be immediately provided for the service of the United States.

An addition to a resolve heretofore reported, and under the consideration of the House, will effect the first mentioned object.

For the others, the committee recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to raise and establish ——— companies of artillerists and engineers, in addition to the present establishment.

Resolved, That the sum of ——— dollars shall be appropriated by law for the purchase of cannon, arms, and ammunition, for the service of the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 9, 1798.

What measures are necessary and proper to be adopted by Congress, in the present conjuncture, to preserve character abroad, esteem for the Government at home, safety to our sea property, and protection to our territory and sovereignty?

France derives several important advantages from the system she is pursuing towards the United States. Besides the sweets of plunder, obtained by her privateers, she keeps in them a nursery of seamen, to be drawn upon, in all conjunctures, by her navy. She unites, by the same means, the United States for energetic measures, and thereby prepares us for the last degree of humiliation and subjection.

To forbear, under such circumstances, from taking naval and military measures, to secure our trade, defend our territory in case of invasion, and prevent or suppress domestic insurrection, would be to offer up the United States a certain prey to France, and exhibit to the world a sad spectacle of national degradation and imbecility.

The United States possess an extensive trade, heavy expenses must be submitted to for its protection. The United States border upon the provinces of great and powerful kingdoms, heavy expenses must be incurred, that we may be at all times in a situation to assert our rights to our own territory. The measures which appear indispensably necessary for Congress to take, are as follows, viz:

1st. An increase of the naval force, to serve as convoys, protect our fisheries, coast, and harbors. 2d. An augmentation of the present military establishment. 3d. Arrangements which, in case of emergency, will give to the President the prompt command of a further and efficacious military force. 4th. The more complete defence of our principal ports by fortifications. 5th. A supply of ordnance, small arms, powder, saltpetre, copper, and military stores. 6th. Additional revenue.

To answer the 1st. Congress ought to provide for the building or purchasing, equipping, &c. of two vessels of twenty-two guns; eight vessels of twenty guns; and ten vessels of sixteen guns, in addition to the three frigates.

Congress ought also to vest the President with authority, in case of open rupture, to provide, equip, and by such means as he may judge best, a number of ships of the line, not exceeding six, or an equivalent force in frigates.

The first may be either built or purchased in the United States. The latter may, perhaps, be obtained in Europe; for which purpose the law should use general expressions, admitting this mode of procuring them.

To build the twenty vessels, equip, man, and provision them for twelve months, will require, as per annexed estimate,

It may, under this head, be also advisable to make a provision for six galleys, carrying each one or two twenty-four pounders. This will require for galleys carrying one twenty-four pounder each, as per annexed estimate,* $68,826.

2d. An augmentation of the present military establishment. This ought to consist of one regiment of infantry; one regiment of artillery; and one regiment of cavalry. The artillery is considered as indispensable, and the cavalry may be highly useful in the Southern States. These will require, agreeably to the annexed estimate, $517,998

3d. An arrangement which, in case of emergency, will give to the President the prompt command of a further and efficacious military force.

* For this and the preceding estimate, see Naval Affairs, No. 11.

This ought to be a provisional army of 20,000 men, and may be organized agreeable to the principles of a bill proposed in the Senate, during the late extraordinary session, to which I beg leave to refer.

4th. The more complete defence of our principal ports by fortifications.

This may require $1,000,000; but, should the naval force be rendered respectable, much of this sum may be saved.

5th. A supply of cannon, small arms, saltpetre, copper, &c. which, severally, will require—

For cannon, as per annexed estimate,	-	-	-	-	-	$308,900
For small arms, say 50,000 stands, at twelve dollars,	-	-	-	-	-	600,000
For powder, saltpetre, copper for sheathing, &c.	-	-	-	-	-	200,000

In framing the law to furnish our magazines with ordnance, it will be proper to employ such expressions as will enable the President to procure brass cannon, mortars, &c. with the necessary quantities of ball, shells, &c. These have not been specified in the estimate; but the sum may, perhaps, be sufficient to comprehend them.

To render the regiment of infantry as useful as possible, it is proposed, that the men should be enlisted to act in the double capacity of marines and infantry. By an arrangement of this kind, and having the men stationed at the principal sea ports, they will be always ready to be put on board such vessels as want them, and when not so wanted, will serve to defend the coast, work upon the fortifications, or in dock yards, and guard the public property from thefts or embezzlement.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JAMES McHENRY.

CONTRACTS FOR THE SUPPLY OF CANNON.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 12TH DAY OF APRIL, 1798.

By direction of the President of the United States, the Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the House of Representatives, the annexed statement, pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed Wednesday, the 28th day of March, 1798.

That a contract was made on the 8th of August, 1794, by the Commissioner of the Revenue, with Messrs. Brown and Francis and others, owners of the Hope Furnace in Rhode Island, for the delivery of iron cannon, viz: 34 of caliber to carry 32 pound shot, and 34 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for fortifications, and sixty of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for frigates, two-thirds of said cannon, by contract, to be delivered on the first day of January, 1795, and the remainder on the first day of May following. The United States to pay one hundred and six dollars and two-thirds, for every ton the cannon should weigh when delivered, and also an allowance for the extra expense of boring out the solid metal, beyond that which would arise from boring them, if cast with a cavity nearly of the size of the intended caliber.

That under this contract, there has been delivered and receipted for, on account of the United States, 34 cannon of caliber to carry 32 pound shot, and 34 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for fortifications, and 59 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for frigates; and the owners of Hope Furnace have been paid for the same, at the rate of one hundred and six dollars and two-thirds per ton, and also an allowance of five thousand nine hundred and fifty-three dollars and sixty-eight cents, for the extra expense of boring out of the solid.

That another contract was made on the 28th June, 1794, by the Commissioner of the Revenue, with Samuel Hughes on behalf of himself and others, owners of a furnace in Cecil county, Maryland, for the delivery of iron cannon, viz: 50 of caliber to carry 32 pound shot, and 50 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for fortifications, and 90 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for frigates or ships of war. Two-thirds of said cannon to be delivered on or before the first day of January, 1795, and the remainder on or before the first day of May, 1795. The United States to pay for cannon, conformably to, and delivered under, this contract, one hundred and six dollars and two-thirds, for every ton such cannon should weigh, and also an allowance for the extra expense of boring out of the solid metal.

That under this contract, there have been delivered and receipted for, on account of the United States, 18 cannon of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for fortifications, and 36 of caliber to carry 24 pound shot, suitable for frigates. No settlement having been made with Mr. Hughes, it cannot be determined what should be allowed for the extra expense of boring out of the solid.

That a third contract was made by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 25th of October, 1796, with Samuel Hughes and others, owners of a furnace in Cecil county, Maryland, for the delivery of 40 iron cannon of caliber to carry 13 pound shot; all of which to be delivered on or before the first day of May, 1797. The United States to pay for the same one hundred and thirty-three dollars and one-quarter, for every ton they might weigh, without engaging to allow for the extra expense of boring out of the solid.

Only three cannon have been receipted for under this contract, for account of the United States.

For information on the subject of cannon purchased, employed, or contracted for, for the revenue cutters, the Secretary takes leave to refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 7th December, 1797, addressed to the chairman of the committee to devise measures for the protection of commerce.

All which is respectfully submitted,

No. 35.

3d SESSION.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DEC. 31, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

A Report of the Secretary of War, made to me on the twenty-fourth of this month, relative to the military establishment, I think it my duty to transmit to Congress, and recommend to their consideration.

JOHN ADAMS.

December 31st, 1798.

The Secretary of War respectfully reports to the President of the United States:

That, there are several subjects which, in his opinion, will deserve the attention of Congress, to render the military establishment more manageable and systematic; and procure to it the means of further improvement.

It is not presumed that Congress will think it prudent to relinquish any of the measures of security which have been so wisely adopted; nor need it be observed, that any relaxation in these may frustrate their object, by affording argument of weakness or irresolution. It may be true, that some late occurrences have rendered the prospect of invasion by France less probable, or more remote; yet, duly considering the rapid vicissitudes, at all times, of political and military events; the extraordinary fluctuations which have been peculiarly characteristic of the still subsisting contest in Europe; and the more extraordinary position of most of the principal nations of that quarter of the globe; it can never be wise to vary our measures of security, with the continually varying aspect of European affairs. On the contrary, a very obvious policy dictates to us, a strenuous endeavor, as far as may be practicable, to place our safety out of the reach of casualties which may befall the contending parties, and the powers more immediately within their vortices. Paying due respect to this state of things; regarding the overthrow of a large portion of Europe as not entirely chimerical, and standing as it were in the midst of falling empires, it will be our prudence to cultivate a spirit of self-dependence, and to endeavor, by unremitting vigilance and exertion, under the blessing of providence, to hold the scales of our destiny in our own hands. In offering these preliminary observations, the Secretary presents nothing new to the President; most, if not all of them, having received, directly or impliedly, in his communications to Congress, his deliberate sanction and authority.

Circumstances as the United States now are, the progress of public danger may render an extension of military preparations indispensable, and a proper organization for the troops of the United States extremely beneficial.

In proportion as the policy of the country is adverse to extensive military establishments, it ought to be our care to render the principles of our military system as perfect as possible. our endeavors to turn to the best account, such force as we at any time may have on foot, and to provide an eligible standard for the augmentations to which particular emergencies may compel a resort.

In these views, it is conceived the organization of our military force would be much improved by modelling it according to the following plan:—

1st. That a regiment of infantry, composed, as at present, of two battalions, and each battalion of five companies, consist of one colonel; two majors, a first and second; one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one paymaster, each of whom shall be a lieutenant; one surgeon, and two surgeon's mates; ten captains; ten first lieutenants, and ten second lieutenants, besides the three lieutenants abovementioned; two cadets, with the pay and emoluments of sergeants; two sergeant majors; two quartermaster sergeants; two chief musicians, first and second; twenty other musicians; forty sergeants; forty corporals; and nine hundred and twenty privates.

2d. That a regiment of dragoons consist of ten troops, making five squadrons, and the following officers and men, viz: one colonel; two majors, a first and second; one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one paymaster, each of whom shall be a lieutenant; one surgeon, and two surgeon's mates; ten captains; ten first, and ten second lieutenants, besides the three lieutenants above mentioned; five cadets, with the pay and emoluments of sergeants; two sergeant majors; two quartermaster sergeants; two chief musicians, first and second. Ten other musicians; forty sergeants; forty corporals; and nine hundred and twenty privates. The privates, including to each troop one saddler, one blacksmith, and one bootmaker.

3d. That a regiment of artillery consist of four battalions, each battalion of four companies, and of the following officers and men, viz: one colonel; four majors; one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one paymaster, each of whom shall be a lieutenant. One surgeon, and two surgeon's mates; sixteen captains; sixteen first, and sixteen second lieutenants, besides the three lieutenants abovementioned; thirty-two cadets, with the pay and emoluments as at present established; four sergeant majors; four quartermaster sergeants; sixty-four sergeants; sixty-four corporals; one chief musician, and ten other musicians; and eight hundred and ninety-six privates, including to each company eight artificers.

The principal reasons for this organization will be briefly suggested and explained.

1st. It will be observed, that the proposed proportion of men to officers in the infantry and cavalry is considerably greater than by the present establishment. This presents, in the first place, the advantage of economy. By the proportional decrease of the officers, savings will result in their pay, subsistence, and the transportation of their baggage; and the last circumstance, by lessening the impediments of an army, is also favorable to the celerity of its movements.

2d. The command of each officer will become more respectable. This will be an inducement to respectable men to accept military appointments, and it will be an incentive to exertion among those who shall be engaged, by upholding that justifiable pride which is a necessary ingredient in the military character. A company will then admit of an eligible sub-division into platoons, sections, and demi-sections, each of a perfect front.

3d. Each battalion will be of the size judged proper for a manœuvring column in the field, and it is that portion of an army, which in the most approved system of tactics is destined to fulfil this object. A battalion, according to the best judgements, sanctioned by experience, ought neither to be too unwieldy for rapid movements, nor so small as to multiply too much the sub-divisions, and render each incapable either of a vigorous impulse or resistance.

4th. The proportion of officers to men ought not to be greater than is adequate to the due management and command of them. A careful examination of this point will satisfy every judge, that the number now proposed will be adequate to both; and it is illustrated by the expectation, that our fundamental orders, in conformity with those of the nations of Europe generally, ought to place our infantry in three ranks, to oppose to an enemy, who shall be in the same order, an equal mass for attack or defence.

But it is not intended to recommend a present augmentation of the number of rank and file, to the proposed standard. It is only wished that it may be adopted provisionally, as that of the war establishment.

The regiments which have been authorized may continue in this respect upon the footing already prescribed; leaving the actual augmentation to depend on events which may create a necessity for the increase of our force.

The other alterations recommended have relation rather to systematic propriety, than to very important military effects.

1st. The term lieutenant-colonel, in our present establishment, has a relative signification, without any thing, in fact, to which it relates: it was introduced during our revolutionary war to facilitate exchanges of prisoners, as our then enemy united the grade of colonel with that of general. But the permanent forms of our military system ought to be regulated by principle, not by the changeable and arbitrary arrangement of a particular nation. The title of colonel, which has greater respectability, is more proper for the commander of a regiment, because it does not, like the other, imply a relation having no existence.

2d. The term ensign is changed into that of lieutenant, as well because the latter, from usage, has additional respectability, offering an inducement to desirable candidates, as because the former, in its origin, signified a standard bearer, and supposed that each company had a distinct standard.

This, in practice, has ceased to be the case; and, for a variety of good reasons, a standard of colors to each battalion of infantry is deemed sufficient. This standard is intended to be confined to a cadet, in whom it may be expected to excite emulation and exertion. The multiplication of grades, inconvenient in exchanges, is thus avoided.

In the cavalry it is proper to allow a standard to each squadron consisting of two troops, and hence it is proposed to have five cadets to a regiment.

3d. The nature of the artillery service, being constantly in detachment, renders it proper to compose a regiment of a greater number of battalions than the other corps. This our present establishment has recognized. But there is now a want of uniformity, which leads to disorderly consequences; one regiment being composed of four battalions, the other of three. The same organization ought to be common to all. The diminution of the number of musicians, while it will save expense, is also warranted by the peculiar nature of the artillery service. They answer in this corps few of the purposes they are applied to in the infantry.

Existing laws contemplate, and with good reason, that the aids of general officers (except of the commander in chief) shall be taken from the regiments; but they do not provide, that, when so taken, their places in the regiment shall be supplied by others. It is conceived, that this ought to be the case. The principles of the establishment supposes, for example, that three officers to a company of a given number are the just and due proportion. If, when an officer be taken from a company to fill one of the stations alluded to, his place be not filled by another, so that the number of officers to a company may remain the same, it must follow, that the company will be deficient in officers. It is true, that the number of a company is continually diminishing, but it diminishes in officers as well as men; and it is not known that the proportion is varied. Practice, in every institution, ought to conform to principle, or there will result more or less of disorder. An army is, in many respects, a machine, of which the displacement of any of the organs, if permitted to continue, injures its symmetry and energy, and leads to disorder and weakness. The increase of the number of rank and file, while it strengthens the reasons for replacing the officers who may be removed, will more than compensate, in point of economy, for the addition of officers by the substitution. This may be submitted to the test of calculation. But, though the place of an officer in his regiment ought to be supplied upon any such removal, he ought not to lose his station in the regiment, but ought to rank, and rise, as if he had continued to serve in it.

I should do injustice to this subject, if I did not acknowledge this plan of organization had received the full and unequivocal approbation of the commander in chief, Lieutenant General Washington.

The annexed schedule (A) will show, in one view, the difference between the present and the proposed establishment.

The provision that aids-de-camp and the officers of inspection shall be drawn from the line of the army is not restricted as to grade: there ought to be such a restriction. The aids of major generals ought not to be taken from a rank superior to that of captain, nor those of the brigadiers from a rank superior to that of first lieutenant. The rank from which inspectors may be taken ought, in like manner, to be limited; those of brigades to the rank of captain; those of divisions to that of major. This will guard against the multiplication of the superior grades, by removals to fill such stations.

The two companies, which it is proposed to add to the actual number of the cavalry, it is desirable should be raised immediately. If this is agreed to, they might receive the denomination of hussar companies—a description of cavalry extremely serviceable in an army.

It is incidentally noticed, that the act of last session, augmenting the dragoon corps to eight companies, and assigning to it a lieutenant colonel and other officers, to constitute it a regiment, has not provided a surgeon or mate. This omission will require attention.

If there shall be occasion for the actual employment of military force, a corps of riflemen will be, for several purposes, extremely useful. The eligible proportion of riflemen to infantry of the line may be taken at a twentieth. It is submitted, whether a specific provision to this effect will not be proper, in arranging the army for a war establishment.

The only provision for the appointment of a quartermaster general is to be found in the act of the 28th of May, authorizing the President to raise a provisional army, which limits his rank and emoluments to those of lieutenant colonel; this provision is conceived to be entirely inadequate for a war establishment. The military duties of the office are of a nature to render it of the first importance in an army—demanding great and peculiar abilities, and a character every way worthy of trust; accordingly, it is the general practice, founded upon very substantial reasons, to confide it to an officer of high military rank. The probability is, that, without a similar arrangement on our part, we shall not be able to command a fit character, and, in taking one of inferior pretensions, we shall subject the service to disadvantages out of all proportion to any objections which may be supposed to militate against the conferring of such rank. It is feared that an appointment under such a provision will only create embarrassment, should there be real necessity for military exertions, and that the alternative must be, either to leave the army destitute of so necessary an organ, or to give it one likely, in the progress of things, to prove unequal to the task. A new provision on this subject appears absolutely indispensable.

The Secretary does not discover, in any of the acts, the necessary provisions for the appointment of hospital officers, or a hospital establishment. As military hospitals are indispensable to an army, especially in time of war, it is respectfully suggested, that provisions on the subject ought to be made by law, and that the regulations to be found in the resolutions of the old Congress, more particularly in those under date of September 30th, 1780, and 3d January, 1782, as containing the faithful results of much experience, may afford some important lights respecting this department.

The certain consequence of disregarding so essential a measure, in the event of war, and the encampments of our army, will be a train of diseases which must cut off a large proportion of our troops.

It is deeply to be lamented, that a very precious period of leisure was not improved, towards forming among ourselves engineers and artilleryists; and that, owing to this neglect, we are in danger of being overtaken by war, without a competent number of characters of these descriptions. To form them suddenly is impracticable: much previous study and experiment are essential. If possible to avoid it, a war ought not to find us unprovided. What has been done to facilitate this object, and the perfection of our artillery, will be seen by the annexed extract of a letter from the Secretary, marked (B), to the chairman of a committee of the House of Representatives, for the protection of commerce and the defence of the country, taken in connexion with the act providing for raising the corps of artilleryists and engineers, with the act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes, passed the 16th of July, 1798. What has resulted from the latter act will make the subject of a particular report. In the mean while, it is conceived to be advisable to endeavor to introduce, from abroad, at least one distinguished engineer, and one distinguished officer of artillery. They may be sought for preferably in the Austrian, and next in the Prussian, armies. The grade of colonels, with adequate pecuniary compensations, may attract officers of a rank inferior to that grade in those armies, who will be of distinguished abilities and merit. But, in this, as we know from past experience, nothing is more easy than to be imposed upon, nothing more difficult than to avoid imposition, and that, therefore, should the measure be sanctioned by a law, it will be requisite to commit the business of procuring such characters to some very judicious hand, under every precaution that can put him on his guard.

It is also suggested, that an inspector of fortifications is much wanted. In case of a legislative provision on this subject, the officer may be either drawn from the corps of artilleryists and engineers, or it may be left discretionary with the President to choose him where he pleases. If, however, the choice is to be restricted to that corps, it will be proper, that withdrawing him from it shall not prevent his right to rise in it, and that his place in the corps should be filled by an officer of the same grade.

It will be easily imagined, that without such an officer the service may essentially suffer. To obviate this, the Department of War has always found it necessary to employ a person who has been paid out of the contingencies for performing that and some other duties of a military nature.

The imprudence of a faithful representation of the real state of the fortifications, public buildings, and barracks, the qualifications of the commandants of forts, the police they observe, and degree of attention they bestow on the works, magazines, and the like, can stand in need of no comment.

It is farther submitted, whether it will not be proper, and conduce to the improvement of our artillery, to enlarge the field from which to select a fit character for inspector of artilleryists. As the law now is, the inspector must be chosen from the corps of artilleryists and engineers, and would require one of its most experienced officers, all whose services are indispensable to the corps itself.

It has been often observed, by officers of the army, that the public would save by the measure, and more satisfaction be given to the soldiers, generally, if a regulation was adopted to insure his clothing shall be fitted to the soldier. It cannot fail to happen, that clothing, made at a distance from the army, will, in numerous instances, be ill fitted to the person to whom it is issued. This is an inconvenience, as it respects appearance, comfort, and ease, and causes the soldier to be careless of his dress. It of course merits consideration, whether it will not be remedied by making provision, by law, for the necessary alteration, at the cost of the soldier. As there are always to be found tailors in an army, the alterations may be made there during seasons of inactivity, and moderate compensation may be established, to be deducted out of the pay of the soldiers. The tailors, who, when so employed, will be exempted from military duty, will be satisfied with very small allowances; and the soldiery will, from the best information I can obtain, prefer this expense to the inconveniences of wearing clothes which do not fit them.

Another point, no less deserving of particular attention, is, the composition of the ration of provisions. It was, in the last session, augmented beyond all former example. It is not recollected that the ration which was allowed during the war with Great Britain was found insufficient by troops once formed to military habits, and acquainted with the best methods of managing their provisions. The present ration, estimating by price, is understood to be greater than the ration in that war, by above fifty per cent. This is evidently a very important augmentation: various disadvantages attend it; a great increase of expense; additional difficulty in furnishing, under all circumstances, the stipulated allowance; consequently, a multiplication of the possible causes of discontent, murmurs, and perhaps even mutiny; the necessity of a greater number of wagons for transportation; and, of course, the extension of this always serious source of embarrassment to military operations.

The quantity of spirituous liquors, which is a component part of the ration, is so large as to endanger, where there might not before exist, habits of intemperance, alike fatal to health and discipline. Experience has repeatedly shown, that many soldiers will exchange their rum for other articles, which is productive of the double mischief of subjecting those with whom the exchange is made to the loss of what is far more necessary, and to all the consequences of brutal intoxication.

These, and such considerations, have induced the Secretary to cause to be inserted in the contracts made under his orders a proviso, "that, if the quantities of the component articles of a ration shall be reduced, by law, the price to be allowed therefor shall be proportionably reduced." And, in the article of enlistment, a proviso, "that the soldier is to accept such ration as is, or shall be, established by law."

It is well understood, that the increase having been once made, a change is delicate; but it is believed to be indispensable, and that the temporary evils of a change can bear no proportion to the permanent and immense evils of a continuance of the error.

It may not, perhaps, be advisable to bring back the ration to the standard of the late war, but to modify it, in some respects, differently, so as not materially to affect the aggregate expense.

For example, it may consist of eighteen ounces of bread or flour, or an equivalent in rice, or Indian meal, when flour cannot be obtained; one pound and a quarter of fresh beef, or one pound of salted beef, or three quarters of a pound of salted pork; salt, when fresh meat is issued, at the rate of two quarts; and candles at the rate of a pound and an half for every hundred rations.

With regard to liquor, it may be best to exclude it from being a component part of the ration, allowing a discretion to commanding officers to cause it to be issued, in quantities not exceeding half a gill per day, except on extraordinary occasions.

Vinegar, also, ought to be furnished, when to be had, at the rate of two quarts, and soap at the rate of two pounds per hundred rations; but this ought to depend on circumstances, and ought not to make part of the established ration.

There are often difficulties in furnishing articles of the latter description, and the equivalent in money is frequently rather pernicious than beneficial. Where there is a contract, the promise of such articles is apt to prove more beneficial to the contractor than to any other person. He commonly so manages it that the substitute is not a real equivalent.

But it need not be remarked, that, whatever is to be done in this respect, must be so conducted, as not to infract the conditions on which the old troops, now in service, were enlisted.

The act which authorizes to raise the twelve regiments of infantry, and six troops of dragoons, provides, that they shall be kept in service during the continuance of the existing differences between the United States and the French republic, if not sooner discharged. Upon the disbanding of these troops, it is to be presumed by far the greatest number of both officers and men will find themselves at a considerable distance from their homes. The same thing also happens to officers on the establishment, whose age or time of life, or scanty fortune, does not admit of their continuance in the army, as well as to privates serving on the frontiers, whose engagements are successively expiring. These all have, or will have, to travel to their respective places of residence, at their own expense, if no provision is made by Congress to meet the case. This, to many of them, must be, and is, an extreme hardship, especially when it is considered, that the profession of arms, however important to the country, and noble in itself, is so far from furnishing to the officers, even of the highest grades, the means of making a tolerable provision out of the savings of their pay, for the future support of themselves and families, in advanced old age, or when their services may be dispensed with by the public, that it requires them to observe the greatest economy to be able to proceed in their career, and defray the expense of their necessary wants.

In the English service, the officer, when disbanded, receives half pay; the private soldier in the cavalry has his horse, and an allowance for his sword, with fourteen days' pay to carry him home; the infantry have likewise fourteen days' pay granted them for the same purpose.

It is respectfully suggested, whether it would not comport with justice, and have a tendency to encourage men to enter into the army, if a provision was made for an allowance to each officer and soldier, on quitting the service, or being disbanded, equivalent to the expense he must incur in returning home.

The act authorising the President of the United States to raise a provisional army, is too important to the peace and safety of the Union, not to require from Congress such a matured revision as may render it effectual to the purposes for which it was framed.

The first section, by which the President was vested with the power to raise ten thousand troops, has expired by its own limitation.

It is conceived advisable, and founded on the soundest policy, that the power to raise such troops as are contemplated by this clause should be extended at least to twenty thousand. To be on safe ground, our preparations and supplies ought to contemplate an army of fifty thousand men.

The act in question contemplates also an auxiliary force, under the denomination of volunteer companies, who shall be armed, clothed, and equipped at their own expense.

It is highly pleasing to mention, that sufficient evidence has appeared, that the patriotism of our independent citizens will not shrink from this measure of defence; the number of volunteer companies which have offered their services being already considerable.

As it may be questioned, whether the act enables the President to appoint all appropriate officers to these companies, when organized into regiments, brigades, and divisions, it is desirable that such power should be expressly given.

A specific provision for the pay and rations to volunteers, during the days it may be necessary to assemble them in bodies in each year, for the purpose of general discipline and manoeuvres, would be very beneficial.

To form effective soldiers at this moment, and at so light an expense to the public, must be looked upon as an object of great national concern, especially when we take into view the difficulty of getting men, trained to arms, in time of actual war.

The value of those patriotic bands of volunteers, who destine themselves to the front of danger, is inappreciable. If well instructed and disciplined, they will, in the event of sudden invasion, be of immense utility and importance. Besides the direct effects of their own exertions in resisting the enemy, till they can be succored by the regular force, if at a distance, the militia, rallying to them, would derive, from their example and countenance, additional courage and perseverance. They would, thus disciplined and aided by the regular force, though small, give a consistency and stability to our first efforts, of which these would otherwise be destitute, and would tend powerfully to prevent great, though, perhaps, partial, calamities.

It is impossible to contemplate the duties of the office of inspector general, without perceiving that their due discharge will require the exercise of extraordinary skill and labor, and that the existing law has assigned no compensation whatever for the exercise of this skill and labor.

In the case of officers taken from the line to perform the specific duties of assistant inspectors, quartermasters, &c. we find the law has made a specific allowance. The principle applies, and with augmented force, to the inspector general, who has not only to create regulations, but to superintend their execution, in addition to his duties as a general officer.

To discharge, with effect, the duties of his office, he must make frequent journeys from one part of the army to another, when it is encamped in different and distant places. It must be conceived that the expenses of such journeys must quickly eat out the narrow allowance of a major general. If filled by a man of talents, without a fortune to meet such expenses, he must either compromise his reputation, and that of the Government, by not producing the results to be expected from his department, or he must ruin himself in performing services for which there is no adequate compensation. The precedent of last war establishes the propriety of an extra allowance for the extra services and expenses to this officer; and it would be infinitely more agreeable and less embarrassing to the Department of War, that the latter, or his expenses on journeys from one part of the army to another, should be settled by a fixed allowance by law, instead of being chargeable to the contingencies of the War Department. A further arrangement is necessary to give full effect to the inspector general's department. During our war with Great Britain, this officer was allowed secretaries, in addition to his aids as major general. It is thought that one secretary to the present officer is indispensable.

It is proper, before closing this reference, to mention a circumstance intimately connected with our military system.

Owing to the increase of the naval and military establishments, the business of purveyor of public supplies has been so augmented, as to require for the War Department alone the exclusive and uninterrupted services of such an officer.

It seems to be improper, that the head of the War Department should be obliged to employ himself in any other manner in the business of the purveyor, than merely to make requisitions for articles wanted; to prescribe the quantities, the times, and places of delivery; and that the whole responsibility for the execution of the order should rest upon the purveyor. A Secretary of War will always find ample employment in the general superintendance and direction of the great operations of his department. If a portion of his time is to be occupied in the details of lesser concerns, it is morally certain that the greater must languish or suffer.

Besides these duties, the purveyor should be charged exclusively with the disposing of all returns from the Indian factories, corresponding with these, keeping all accounts, and conducting all concerns relative to them, under the direction of the Secretary.

He might also be the agent and organ to procure the means of transportation for all supplies sent from the seat of Government, or elsewhere, to the army, agents, or quartermasters, to arsenals, and distant places of deposit.

The Secretary takes leave to recapitulate, for the purpose of presenting, in a concise view, the propositions respectfully recommended to attention, by the foregoing observations.

1st. A new modification of the military, so as to admit of an increase of numbers to the companies and regiments, in case of war; an alteration in the denomination of certain grades; and a perfect uniformity of arrangements in corps of the same species of troops.

2d. Regulations to preserve to the companies and regiments, their competent number of officers, in cases where any are taken from the line to act as aids-de-camp, inspectors, paymasters, quartermasters, &c.

3d. To designate the grades from which aids-de-camp and officers of inspection may be taken, in order to prevent the multiplication of the higher grades.

4th. To add to the existing establishment two companies of horse, to be denominated and act as hussars; and a surgeon and mate to the regiment of cavalry.

5th. To include, in the arrangement for the war establishment, a proportion of riflemen, estimated at one-twentieth of the whole number of infantry.

6th. An alteration in the provision for a quartermaster general, to ensure the procurement of a fit character to execute the duties of this important office.

7th. A provision for a hospital department for the army.

8th. A power to procure from abroad one distinguished engineer, and also an officer of artillery, and suitable appointments for the same.

9th. To provide for the appointment of an inspector of fortifications.

10th. That the choice of an inspector of artillery be left at large.

11th. A provision for altering and fitting the clothing issued to the soldiers.

12th. An alteration in the ration to be issued to the troops.

13th. A provision for the reasonable expenses of officers and soldiers in returning to their homes, when disbanded, or incapacitated by age or sickness, for further service.

14th. A revival and extension of the power to raise a provisional army.

15th. A specific provision for the appointment of appropriate officers for the volunteer companies, that are or may be accepted, when formed into regiments, brigades, or divisions; and for pay and rations to such volunteers, for those days in every year it may be necessary to assemble them in bodies, for the purposes of discipline and training.

16th. A further provision for the extra services and expenses of the inspector general, and to allow him, besides his aids, one secretary.

17th. The employment of a purveyor of public supplies, exclusively for the War Department.

All which the Secretary has the honor most respectfully to submit,

JAMES MCHENRY.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War, to the Hon. Samuel Sewall, Chairman of the Committee of Defence, &c. dated

“WAR DEPARTMENT, June 28, 1798.

“3d. The act providing for raising and organizing a corps of artilleryists and engineers, and the act to provide an additional regiment of the same, both enjoin the procurement, at the public expense, of all necessary books, instruments, and apparatus, for the benefit of the said respective regiments.

“The Secretary, without designing to derogate from the merits of the officers appointed to the corps established by the acts cited, feels it his duty to suggest, that other, and supplementary means of instruction, to the books and instruments to be provided, appear to be absolutely indispensable to enable them to acquire a due degree of knowledge in the objects of their corps. It is certain, that the best faculties and inclinations for the arts and sciences cannot be unfolded and applied to useful purposes, when proper encouragement and assistance have been denied or neglected.

"The art of fortification is connected with so many others, is of such extent, and its operations dependent on, and affected by, circumstances so infinitely varied, that it is impossible any man can be rendered master of it by experience alone. Besides, the knowledge acquired by experience is often the result of our own faults, and acquired by a heavy, and, it may be, in this art, disastrous expense to the public.

"It is certainly to be wished, that more attention had been paid to this subject, and that past recommendations had found a favorable access to the ear of Congress.

"If the present moment does not admit of carrying into effect all that is desirable, and ought, under different circumstances, to be done, to create a body of qualified and scientific engineers, it may, notwithstanding, be advisable to advance towards this point by such measures as are compatible with our present situation.

"The knowledge of certain arts and sciences is absolutely necessary to the artillerist and engineer; such are arithmetic, geometry, mechanics, hydraulics, and designing.

"Without a knowledge of arithmetic, an officer cannot calculate the expense incurred, or to be incurred, on any work, or any subject whatever.

"Without that of geometry, he cannot form a just plan or chart, regulate the design of a fortification, with its lines and angles, trace it upon the ground it is to occupy, nor estimate and measure the solidity and surface of its several parts.

"Without that of mechanics, he will not be able to appreciate the proportion of the machines used in war, the dimensions of carriages for artillery, nor to augment or diminish the force of the several kinds of machines, when it may be necessary.

"Without that of designing, he will not have it in his power, to give plans and profiles of works, nor to exhibit the topography of the environs of a work, or any part of a country.

"Without that of hydraulics, he will not be qualified to conduct water from one place to another, or to sustain and elevate it when there may be a necessity in sieges, or other military operations, for so doing.

"It is therefore submitted, whether provision ought not to be made for the employment of three or four teachers of the enumerated sciences, to be attached generally to the two corps of artillerists and engineers, and obligated to give instructions and lessons, at such times, places, and under such regulations, as the President may direct.

"The employment of teachers would give the intended effect to the provision of the laws, for the appointment of two cadets to each company. It was supposed, that these cadets would form a nursery, from which qualified officers might be drawn to fill vacancies, &c. but it must occur, that without proper masters to teach them the sciences, necessary to the engineer and artillerist, this nursery can produce no valuable plants.

"It is also submitted, whether it might not be proper to augment the pay of cadets to nine dollars per month, with two rations. This would excite their emulation, give them a consideration above sergeants, and enable them to appear in a more respectable dress.

"It is with infinite regret the Secretary is obliged to mention, that the ordnance of our country is by no means in a situation to command respect. That part of it was collected during a season of difficulty and necessity, from different countries, and consequently, the guns are, many of them, essentially defective, and those of the same class differ in length, weight, and caliber. The variance in these particulars occasions much trouble and inconvenience, in providing appropriate ammunition, stores, apparatus, and carriages, besides subjecting the military service to injurious delays, and the fatal consequences which might result from ammunition and implements being supplied which, in time of need, will be found not adapted to the piece.

"As there is no established standard, it has also happened, from a defect of knowledge in our founders, or some other cause, that most of the cannon that have been cast within, or on account of, the United States, are defective in very essential points, and exhibit varieties in those cast at the same furnace, and of the same class, with those procured from abroad.

"It is important that some arrangement should be immediately adopted, calculated to give efficacy to a proper system, and correct these evils. It is not enough that the President determine upon the size, weight, dimensions, and calibers of the different kinds of cannon, either to be made, or imported into the United States, for their use, unless an inspector of artillery can be appointed, to see that all regulations appertaining to the ordnance department be executed and observed with exactitude.

"We cannot presume that contracts, however carefully made, and conditioned, or even a national foundry, will produce cannon conformable to a given specific standard for each class, so long as the United States are without an officer of skill to inspect, and receive, or reject them.

"I cannot conceive any appointment more necessary to our military undertakings, and infant navy, than an inspector of artillery, and I must flatter myself that the committee will feel as I do upon this occasion.

"They will not, I am persuaded, imagine that it can be possible for a Secretary of War, to discharge the duties of his appointment, and, at the same time, to visit foundries, examine all kinds of ordnance, direct the dimensions of gun carriages and implements, order the proper moulds for casting shot, shells, &c. review and decide upon the qualities of every different production, and point out the means of remedying existing defects, and generally perform all the other duties attached to the office of inspector of artillery.

"The Secretary indulges the hope, that the committee will recommend, and the wisdom of Congress think proper to create, in the Department of War, the office of inspector of artillery, with a salary adequate to its nature and importance, and calculated to obtain a person qualified to fill it. On this important head he takes leave further to mention, that other countries owe the excellency of their ordnance to the establishment of such an officer, and that in England, particularly, and at a late day, the appointment of a scientific and experienced inspector has given a perfection to their ordnance never before known."

POWERS AND EMOLUMENTS OF BREVET RANK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 4, 1799.

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the committee of claims, to whom was referred the petition of Moses White, with the report of the former Secretary of the Treasury thereon, made the following report:

That the object of the petitioner was to obtain a settlement and allowance of his account against the United States, for services and expenditures on behalf of the public during the war.

The powers vested by law in the officers of the Treasury Department are competent to adjust and settle most of the items mentioned in the account of the petitioner; and, since his petition was originally referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, those items have been considered, and partially adjusted by the proper officers. The committee are therefore of opinion, that with respect to that part of the petitioner's account, it would not be expedient or proper for the Legislature to interfere: but the item of the greatest magnitude, and of most importance to the petitioner, which is a claim for additional pay as aid-de-camp to Brigadier General Moses Hazen, from the first of August, 1781, to November 3d, 1783, not having been expressly authorized by an act of Congress, has not been allowed in the settlement of the account.

With respect to this part of the petitioner's claim, the committee report, that by the act of Congress of the 21st of June, 1775, the commander in chief was allowed three, and each major general two aids-de-camp, whose pay and rank were established by subsequent resolutions. By a resolution of Congress on the 30th of March, 1776, each brigadier general, when on command, was empowered to appoint a brigadier major, and, by another resolution, on the first day of July, in the same year, a brigadier general, acting in a separate department, was allowed an aid-de-camp.

On the 27th day of May, 1778, it was provided, "that the brigade major should be appointed as heretofore by the commander in chief, or commander in a separate department, out of the captains in the brigade to which he should be appointed"—and by a resolution of that date, the additional pay of aids-de-camp and of brigade majors was established. Upon the 28th of June, 1782, so much of the act of the 27th day of May, 1778, as relates to the additional pay given to captains and subalterns, acting as aids-de-camp and brigade majors, was repealed, and on the same day Congress resolved "that there should be such additional pay and emoluments to the pay of captains and subalterns, serving as aids-de-camp to major generals, or brigadier generals, and to brigade majors, as should make their pay and emoluments equal to the pay and emoluments of a major in the line of the army."

By a resolution of Congress, on the 29th day of June, 1781, General Hazen was "appointed a brigadier in the army of the United States, by brevet." It appears by a certificate from General Hazen, that the petitioner acted as his aid-de-camp during the time for which he prays compensation.

The only doubt which appears to have arisen respecting the propriety of allowing this claim is understood to have been because General Hazen held the rank of brigadier by brevet commission only.

Although brevet officers were not entitled to any additional pay in consequence of their brevet promotion, yet it gave them conditional rank—when on command of mixed corps, or on court martials, they took rank with the youngest officer of the grade to which they were promoted—hence, in the local command of his own regiment, General Hazen had no additional rank; but on command, &c. he took rank as the youngest brigadier. With respect to the circumstance of his receiving no additional pay, in consequence of the appointment, the committee conceive it will not apply to the question now under consideration. If a brigadier held the rank and command, whether he was a volunteer, or held it by courtesy, or received no pay, they apprehend, by established custom, he was entitled to his staff officers, and they to the customary allowance for their services. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on this part of the petitioner's claim, states that he had not been able "to discover any resolution of Congress by which the claim could be decided; but that there were precedents in practice in favor of it as applied to brigadiers by commission; that, if this practice were to govern, the circumstance of a brevet appointment would not, in the opinion of the Secretary, constitute a ground of difference, to the prejudice of the petitioner, inasmuch as the brigadier is understood to have the actual command of a brigade at the time; in which case, the principles of service, with regard to an aid-de-camp, would apply as fully to him as to the brigadier by commission."

The committee concur with the Secretary of the Treasury in the opinion above expressed, and think that the petitioner ought to receive compensation for his services as aid-de-camp; they therefore submit to the consideration of the House the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That in the adjustment of the amount of Moses White, late a captain in the army of the United States, the accounting officers of the treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to credit and allow the account of the said Moses White, for his additional pay and emoluments as an aid-de-camp, during the time he acted in that capacity to Brigadier General Moses Hazen, upon the same principles which have heretofore prevailed in the settlement of accounts of officers acting as aids-de-camp to brigadier generals in the line of the army.

ARMORY AT SPRINGFIELD.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 7, 1800.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 6, 1800.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit a report, exhibiting the expenses of the national armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, together with the fullest information I have been able to obtain, relative to the said establishment.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JAMES MCHENRY.

The Hon. the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 6, 1800.

The Secretary of War has the honor to lay before the Senate of the United States, an exhibit of the expenses of the national armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, together with the fullest information he has been able to obtain relative to the said establishment.

The following sums appear to comprise the annual expenditures at, and upon, this armory, from the commencement of the same, in the year 1795, down to the 1st of October, 1799.

In the year 1795, expended	-	-	-	-	-	$12,095 25
Do. 1796, do.	-	-	-	-	-	12,286 49
Do. 1797, do.	-	-	-	-	-	11,175 28
Do. 1798, do.	-	-	-	-	-	22,245 00
From 1st January, to 1st October, 1799,	-	-	-	-	-	48,900 00
Cost of rations issued during the above periods,	-	-	-	-	-	20,563 00
Estimated value of musket stocks,	-	-	-	-	-	2,000 00
Making a total of.	-	-	-	-	-	$129,365 2

The muskets annually fabricated, in the same period, were, viz:

In the year 1795,	-	-	-	245	To July 1st, 1799,	-	-	-	1,888
Do. 1796,	-	-	-	825	In July, August, and September, 1799,	-	-	-	1,184
Do. 1797,	-	-	-	1,038
Do. 1798,	-	-	-	1,044
					Total number,	-	-	-	6,224

In order to form a just opinion of the average price, or cost, of the muskets manufactured as aforesaid, it will be proper to distinguish, and deduct from the total amount, the sums which have been expended upon the buildings, machinery, tools, &c., and the value of the unfinished works, the tools and materials on hand, the 1st October, 1799; as well as of certain incidental work, in repairing French arms in store, and making or repairing cannon carriages.

Although it is stated by the superintendent of the armory to the Secretary, to be wholly out of his power to determine accurately, and with certainty, what proportion of the money expended was laid out on the works, and what on the arms; which, he observes, will be readily conceived on reflecting, that, at the commencement of the business, the public buildings were out of repair; that large sums were expended on them; that new buildings were erected; and that for want of proper assistants and system, he did not keep separate accounts; that, besides, the artificers were employed for some time on the buildings, instead of the manufactory, and in making the necessary pieces of machinery and tools; yet, according to the best judgment he can form, the cost of the workshops and other buildings for the armorers, water dam, and privilege, together with the machinery belonging thereto, and rations drawn by the men while employed in these incidental labors, may be estimated at -

Value of parts of muskets on hand,	-	-	-	-	$20,000 00
Stock on hand,	-	-	-	-	7,591 50
Expense of cleaning and repairing French arms in store, and work done to cannon carriages for five years,	-	-	-	-	6,958 17
Tools and utensils, estimated at	-	-	-	-	3,800 00

This latter sum, deducted from the total amount of expenditures, leaves a balance of $82,015 35, which, divided by 6,224, the number of muskets fabricated since the commencement of the armory down to the 1st of October, 1799, makes each musket to cost about $13 17.

If we take into view the difficulties always attendant upon the first operations of an establishment, requiring so much skill as the fabrication of arms; that few or none of the workmen were, at first, masters of the business; that some unsuccessful attempts in the proper construction of the machinery, and formation of parts of the musket, must necessarily have occurred; that time and some experience was essential to adjust the various branches of the business to each other, and to ascertain to what branches the capacities and skill of the different persons employed were most appropriate; we shall find reason to be satisfied with the average cost of the muskets, and a sufficient explanation, should any defects appear in some of the earliest manufactured.

The works being now complete, and labor-saving machines operating to great advantage, the artificers, too, being generally well instructed, and the business better arranged, and carried on more systematically, what do muskets now cost the United States at Springfield?

There are, at this time, employed in the armory, 183 artificers, and 11 apprentices. The number employed for the months of August, September, and October ultimo, average 137 per month. In two of these months, there were completed, 884 muskets, being 17 to each working day, or 442 muskets per month.

The superintendent states, as the result of positive experience, the monthly expenditures of the armory to be as follows, viz:

Iron, 3 tons, 15 cwt. 2 qrs. cost	-	-	-	-	$ 592 17
Wages of workmen, including the pay of the superintendent and master armorers,	-	-	-	-	2,180 69
Rations for the men,	-	-	-	-	546 00
Wear of grindstones,	-	-	-	-	50 00
Charcoal and sea coal,	-	-	-	-	250 00
Estimated cost of musket stocks,	-	-	-	-	150 00
Emery, oil, buff leather, &c.	-	-	-	-	36 00
Cast steel, brass, crucibles, and wire,	-	-	-	-	18 50
Screws, sand paper, and tallow,	-	-	-	-	38 00
Clothing apprentices, and team work,	-	-	-	-	45 00
Files,	-	-	-	-	100 00
Contingent charges,	-	-	-	-	100 00
					$4,106 36

This sum, then, or the monthly expenditures apportioned on the number of muskets made monthly, shows their cost to the United States, to be about $9 29 per musket.

This difference in the cost of the musket may be attributed to the price of the ration being less now than heretofore; to the workmen having become more expert; to the materials being bought in larger quantities, coming lower; to supplies being more regularly furnished; and, generally, to the improvements in the machinery and system for carrying on the manufactory.

The high prices offered artificers by private contractors for small arms, have obliged the superintendent to give higher wages since these contracts have been formed. This, however, cannot be long felt disadvantageously, and must operate to increase the number of workmen skilled in the business, and ultimately lower the price of wages. At present, the average wages to workmen at the armory is nearly fifteen dollars per month.

The superintendent, however, expresses himself confidently, that the cost of each musket to the Government, in future, cannot exceed ten dollars.

The progressive improvements in the manufactory will be best evidenced by the statement of the arms made in each year; and the following one, of the number made and turned into the store, during certain parts of the years 1798 and 1799:

In the month of September, 1798, there were made and delivered to the store keeper,	-	-	-	-	80 muskets.
Do. October,	-	-	-	-	80 do.
Do. November,	-	-	-	-	150 do.
Do. December,	-	-	-	-	196 do.
In the month of January, 1799,	-	-	-	-	200 do.
Do. February,	-	-	-	-	250 do.
Do. March,	-	-	-	-	339 do.
Do. April,	-	-	-	-	338 do.
Do. May,	-	-	-	-	336 do.
Do. June,	-	-	-	-	425 do.
Do. July,	-	-	-	-	300 do.
Do. August,	-	-	-	-	442 do.
Do. September,	-	-	-	-	442 do.

During the last six months, there has been nearly the same number of hands employed, or between 130 and 150. In October, 1798, there were 118 men, and these made 80 muskets only; in November, 121 men, who made 150 muskets; which last is at the rate of near 21 days' work to each musket. The superintendent observes, on this head, that the men can now do double, and, in some instances, treble the work, in the same time; and that a workman, at present, makes a complete musket in somewhat less than nine days; that he finds the workmen now make and complete, in every part, 17 muskets per day, in the usual working hours; and what is, perhaps, of more consequence, that the work, besides being sooner, is much better done.

Before closing this report, it will be proper to mention, that cogent considerations seem to require there should be a power vested in the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, to vary the compensation of the superintendents and master armorers. Superintendents, in particular, are subjected to expenses which attaches to their station, and cannot be avoided by them.

It is essential also to notice, that it would greatly conduce to the success and improvement of our armories, were, 1st. The workmen, while employed in them, to be exempted from militia service; and, during the term of their engagement, from civil process for all debts or contracts.

2. Were they to be obliged, by a summary process, to fulfil their engagements with the armory.

3. Were a fine to be imposed upon any person who shall withdraw them from the armory, or in whose service they shall be found, after due notice shall be given of their engagements with the armory.

All which is respectfully submitted,

JAMES MCHENRY, Secretary of War.

SUSPENSION OF THE RECRUITING SERVICE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN. 13, 1800.

MR. HARRISON GRAY OTIS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the speech of the President of the United States as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources, and the situation of our country," reported in part:

That, in the opinion of the committee, no such material change in the state of the foreign relations of the United States has happened, as would justify a relinquishment of any of the means of defence heretofore adopted by Congress, but that the national honor and interest, in the present posture of affairs, make it prudent and necessary to continue prepared for the worst event; but while danger still threatens our country, yet circumstances having diminished the probability of an immediate invasion, the attention of the committee has been particularly directed to the state of the military establishment, with a view to reconcile safety with economy, to preserve the establishment, and retrench the expense. The annexed abstract, and letter from the Secretary of War, exhibit the state of the twelve new regiments of infantry according to the latest returns. As these men have received their bounty and clothing, and are daily improving in discipline; as they would be useful in any sudden emergency; and the greater part of them may also be usefully employed, until wanted for actual service, on the fortifications of ports and harbors; it is conceived proper to retain them, but to suspend the recruiting service until the approach of danger shall compel the Government to resume it. This project combines the advantage of an important reduction of the national expense, with that of having at command a body of officers ready for the service upon short notice, and a number of disciplined troops sufficient for the present occasion.

The committee, therefore, submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, all enlistments, under an act entitled "An act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes," shall be suspended until the next session of Congress, unless war should break out between the United States and a foreign European power, or in case imminent danger of invasion of their territory, by any such power, shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States, be discovered to exist.

SIR:

WAR DEPARTMENT, 2d January, 1800.

I received your letter dated yesterday, and have the honor to inform the committee of defence, that I am preparing, and have nearly finished, a report to the President of the United States, on the subject of the military establishment, containing propositions which it is conceived would improve it, and detailing information from the latest documents, as far as they go, that have been transmitted to me, relative to the number of men that have been actually enlisted in the new regiments.

It will be conceived the report mentioned is intended to embrace the most material objects that have occurred to me, as promising amelioration to our military system. The President, I respectfully presume, will communicate the same to Congress.

The number of men enlisted, at the dates therein specified, as appears from the latest returns to the War Department, in the twelve new regiments of infantry, will be seen by the enclosed statements, which is respectfully submitted.

The other requisitions will require some time to prepare an accurate reply to. They shall claim my attention, and an answer be furnished as soon as possible.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient humble servant,

JAMES MCHENRY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 2d, 1800.

MILITARY ACADEMY, AND REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 14, 1800.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

A report, made to me on the fifth of this month, by the Secretary of War, contains various matters, in which the honor and safety of the nation are deeply interested; I transmit it, therefore, to Congress, and recommend it to their serious consideration.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, January 13th, 1800.

The Secretary of War respectfully requests the attention of the President of the United States, to certain measures and arrangements, which appear to him to be indispensable to the improvement of our military system, and solicits, if it shall be thought proper, that the same may be submitted to Congress.

No sentiment is more just than this, that, in proportion as the circumstances and policy of a people are opposed to the maintenance of a large military force, it is important that as much perfection as possible be given to that which may at any time exist.

It is not, however, enough, that the troops it may be deemed proper to maintain be rendered as perfect as possible, in form, organization, and discipline; the dignity, the character to be supported, and the safety of the country, further require that it should have military institutions, should be capable of perpetuating the art of war, and of furnishing the means for forming a new and enlarged army, fit for service, in the shortest time possible, and at the least practicable expense to the State.

Let it not be presumed, that a country, however distantly situated from other nations, or favored by the courage and genius of its inhabitants, can neglect, with impunity, military institutions, or that it may, safely, consider all regular force to be useless, except when there is an enemy present to employ it. A country which acts upon such a maxim will invariably attract injuries and enemies, and, sooner or later, sink by internal discords, or see its noble spirit broke down by repeated humiliations, and the whole people thus prepared for the last stage of national degradation.

If the farmer would secure his flocks, he must go to the expense of shepherds; if preserve his crops, he must enclose his fields. In like manner, to ensure safety to the nation, it is necessary that the leading avenues into it be guarded by troops and fortifications. Before the invention of gunpowder, the smallest villages were invested with walls, so that a long siege was often requisite to reduce them. Since that epoch, the history of almost, if not every war, contains undeniable proofs of the utility of fortifications, and the necessity of disciplined troops, to the defence of a country. Would it be wise or expedient in us to pursue a different course, and shut our eyes against the innumerable facts on record, in favor of their essentiality. Are we without regular troops, we may soon lose the military art; are we without engineers, not a little of the money employed on fortifications will be always hazarded, if not actually thrown away, and generals of the most consummate genius forced to capitulate in the field, whose retreat might have been covered by a fortification, or the battle decided in his favor by a happily contrived intrenchment.

Since, however, it seems to be agreed, that we are not to keep on foot numerous forces, and it would be impossible, on a sudden, to extend, to every essential point, our fortifications, military science, in its various branches, ought to be cultivated with peculiar care, in proper nurseries; so that a sufficient stock may always exist, ready to be imparted and diffused to any extent, and a competent number of persons be prepared and qualified to act as engineers, and others as instructors, to additional troops, which events may successively require to be raised. This will be to substitute the elements of an army to the thing itself, and will greatly tend to enable the Government to dispense with a large body of standing forces, from the facility which it will give of procuring officers, and forming soldiers promptly in all emergencies.

No sound mind, after a fair view of the subject, can doubt the essentiality of military science in time of war, any more than the moral certainty that the most pacific policy on the part of Government, and the most solemn and well observed treaties, will not preserve a country from being engaged in war more or less frequently. To avoid great evils, we must either have a respectable force always ready for service, or the means of preparing such a force with certainty and expedition. The latter, as most agreeable to the genius of our Government and nation, is the object of the following propositions.

1st. A Military Academy.

This object has repeatedly engaged the favorable attention of the Legislature, and some laws towards its consummation have been passed. These, however, being yet inadequate to afford the requisite instruction to officers, and others, in "the principles of war, the exercises it requires, and the sciences upon which they are founded," the adoption of a more perfect plan is conceived to be indispensable for these purposes. With this view, the following plan is respectfully suggested, formed upon those of institutions of a similar nature, from which the nations who have founded them derive the most decided advantages.

It is proposed, that this academy shall consist of four schools: one, to be called "The Fundamental School;" another, "The School of Engineers and Artillerists;" another, "The School of Cavalry and Infantry;" and a fourth, "The School of the Navy;" and be provided with the following officers, professors, and teachers.

A Director General to superintend the three first schools.

A Director of the Fundamental School.

A Director of the School of Engineers and Artillerists.

A Director of the School of Cavalry and Infantry.

A Director of the School of the Navy.

Six Professors of Mathematics.

Four Professors of Geography and Natural Philosophy.

Two Professors of Chemistry, including Mineralogy.

Three Architects.

Four Designing and Drawing Masters.

One Riding Master.

One Fencing Master.

To be thus distributed among the several schools:

To the Fundamental School.

One Director.

Four Professors of Mathematics.

Two Professors of Geography and Natural Philosophy.

One Designing and Drawing Master.

One Professor of Chemistry.

To the School of Engineers and Artillerists.

One Director.
 Two Professors of Mathematics.
 Two Professors of Geography and Natural Philosophy.
 One Professor of Chemistry.
 Two Architects.
 Three Designing and Drawing Masters.

To the School of Cavalry and Infantry.

A Director.
 A Riding Master.
 A Fencing Master.

To the School of the Navy.

A Director.
 A Professor of Mathematics.
 A Professor of Geography and Natural Philosophy.
 An Architect.
 One Designing and Drawing Master.

The Fundamental School is designed to form Engineers, including Geographical Engineers, Miners, and officers for the Artillery, Cavalry, Infantry, and Navy; consequently, in this school is to be taught all the sciences necessary to a perfect knowledge of the different branches of the military art.

The School of Engineers and Artillerists, to teach those admitted therein, and appointed or designed for Engineers, the application of the theoretic knowledge which they had acquired in the Fundamental School, to the construction of all sorts of fortifications and military buildings appertaining thereto, to mines, and counter mines, sieges, attack and defence, to mineralogy, to the art of projecting and constructing bridges, roads, canals, and maritime posts, and all works relative thereto, to all geographic and topographic operations, the calculations relative to the same, to designing and drawing charts, &c.

To those appointed or designed for the artillery service, the application of the theoretic knowledge, acquired in the Fundamental School, to the construction of gun carriages, pontoons, the fabrication of cannon and fire arms, and to all the manœuvres of war which depend upon artillery.

The School of Cavalry and Infantry, to teach those admitted therein, and appointed to, or destined for, the cavalry, the tactics, exercise, and police of cavalry; those for the infantry, the tactics of infantry, and all that concerns the police of an army, in the field and in quarters.

The School of the Navy, to teach those appointed to, or destined for, this service, the application of the knowledge acquired in the Fundamental School in arithmetic, algebra, geometry, statics, and navigation. To this end, after having passed examination, they shall make voyages or cruises, under skilful officers, for certain periods, during which time they ought to be exercised in the manœuvres and observations most useful in service, and be instructed in whatever respects rigging of vessels of war, pilotage, and the management of cannon.

Functions of the Principal Officers.

The Director General to have the general superintendance of the schools, particularly of the Fundamental School; to occupy himself incessantly with the means of attaining the end of the institution, which is the greatest possible instruction to the pupils.

He will inform himself of their progress in the studies relative to the service to which they are destined, and collect all the facts proper to be laid before the President, to enable him to form an opinion of the fitness of any individual, who has not had one, for an appointment; or, in case he has, to judge how, and when, his talents can, upon occasion, be most beneficially employed.

He will attend, particularly, to the execution of whatever respects the admission of pupils; their transfer from the school of theory into that of practice; their passage from one class or division, in the same school, to another; and the examinations which they ought respectively to undergo.

He will propose a list of the officers of the army, proper to be received into the schools, and will furnish the Secretary of War with information, from time to time, relative to their progress, conduct, and capacity to fill stations to which their genius and knowledge may particularly point.

He will give such certificates to the officers, cadets, or pupils, as they shall have merited.

The directors of each of the military schools will receive from the Director General, instructions detailing their functions and powers; to him they will make their reports.

With respect to the School of the Navy, the director thereof will receive his instructions from the Secretary of the Navy.

The Director General, and the other directors, to be officers of the army or navy, according as the studies and exercises of the particular school shall be most intimately connected with either service.

These schools to be provided with proper apparatus and instruments, for philosophical and chemical experiments, for astronomical and nautical observations, for surveying, and such other processes as are requisite to the several topics and branches of instruction.

The site of schools of engineers and artillerists, and of the navy, ought to be on navigable water. For this purpose, a piece of ground ought to be purchased, sufficient for experiments in tactics, gunnery, and fortification. The situation upon a navigable water is also requisite, to admit of specimens of naval construction and naval exercises.

It would also tend greatly to the perfection of the plan, if the academy of artillerists and engineers was situated in the neighborhood of foundries of cannon and manufactories of small arms.

Barracks and other proper buildings must be erected, for the accommodation of the directors, professors, and students, and for the laboratories and other works to be carried on at the respective schools.

The cadets of the army, and a certain number of young persons, destined for military and naval service, ought to study at least two years in the Fundamental School; and if destined for the corps of engineers or artillerists, or for the navy, two years more in the appropriate school; if for the cavalry or infantry, one year more in the appropriate school. But persons who, by previous instruction elsewhere, may have become acquainted with some or all of the branches taught in the Fundamental School, may, after due examination by the directors and professors of that school, be either received then for a shorter time, or pass immediately to one or other of the schools of practice, according to the nature and extent of their acquirements and intended destination.

In addition to these, detachments of officers and non-commissioned officers of the army ought to attend one or other of the schools, in rotation, for the purposes of instruction and exercise, according to the nature of the corps to which they respectively belong.

It may be noticed also in this place, that it would be a wise addition if Government would authorize such a number of sergeants, supernumerary to those belonging to the regiments on the establishment, as would suffice with them for an army of fifty thousand men. All the supernumeraries to receive, according to their capacities, instruction at the academy, and occasionally sent to do duty with the army.

This outline of a Military Academy, which is conformable to that of similar institutions in other countries, particularly in France, is not meant to imply any thing conclusive: the plan may be modified, perhaps, to advantage. At all events, it ought to be left with the President to proportion the number of cadets, and others, to be admitted into the schools, and to prescribe, definitively, relative to the requisites to entitle to admission, the periods of noviciate, transfers from the schools to particular corps, and whatever respects organization, regulations, and police.

And here it may be proper to observe, that though provision should be made by law for the proposed establishment, in its full latitude, yet it may be left in the discretion of the President to appoint so many of the professors and masters only, as experience shall show to be necessary.

Will it be thought superfluous to remark, relative to the utility of this institution, that it is from the military schools of France have issued those general and other officers, whose skill and recent achievements in war have rendered them subjects for military history, and enabled the present governors of that nation, successively, and almost instantaneously, to form immense disciplined armies:

Is it not greatly desirable to be so provided and prepared for all emergencies?

An enemy who meditates invasion will naturally examine what he will have to encounter before he undertakes it. Acting with common prudence, he must proportion his military array to the obstacles in fortifications and disposable force it will have to overcome, and which may be so stationed and improved, as to require from him an army and apparatus, expensive beyond his resources to support. Our country, by a skillful application of very moderate means, may thus avert from its bosom the most expensive and calamitous wars.

In treating upon such an institution, it was encouraging to reflect, that, happily, it coincided with your uniform wish to see our country placed in a situation which would entitle the just maxims of its policy to be respected, and enable it to meet any adverse accidents it may be reserved to encounter.

The measure proposed has also the high sanction of our late venerated President, whose talents and services were devoted, not to produce personal results, but to render a whole people great, flourishing, and happy.

"The institution of a Military Academy," this great man observes, in his last impressive speech, "is also recommended by cogent reasons: however pacific the general policy of a nation may be, it ought never to be without an adequate stock of military knowledge, for emergencies. The first would impair the energy of its character; and both would hazard its safety, or expose it to greater evils, when war could not be avoided. Besides, that war might often not depend upon its own choice. In proportion as the observance of pacific maxims might exempt a nation from the necessity of practising the rules of the military art, ought to be its care in preserving and transmitting, by proper establishments, the knowledge of that art. Whatever argument may be drawn from particular examples, superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subject will evince that the art of war is at once comprehensive and complicated; that it demands much previous study; and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the security of a nation. This, therefore, ought to be a serious care of every government; and, for this purpose, an academy, where a regular course of instruction is given, is an obvious expedient, which different nations have successfully employed."

Will not the patriotism and good sense of our country readily consent to found an institution, at a moderate expense, recommended by such authorities, and which must produce the happiest effects? And yet it ought not to excite surprise, if, in a season of profound peace, the minds of a generality of a people, partaking of the public calm, should become inattentive to the storm that may be collecting at a distance. Are we in the midst of that profound calm, and can the eye perceive no cloud in the horizon? But, were the heavens without one threatening spot, and peace universal on earth, ought the watchmen of a nation to trust to such evanescent and deceptive appearances? And will not an intelligent people, instructed by the wisdom of ages, and having every reason to confide in those to whom they have assigned the direction of their affairs, gladly see establishments arise, and arrangements made, which shall render the thunder harmless when it shall burst over their heads. In such conjunctures, (and such must happen to the United States,) corps of well instructed officers and troops are to a country, what anchors are to a ship, driven by a tempest towards a rocky shore.

SECOND. A modification of the two Regiments of Artillerists and Engineers, so as to create, instead thereof, one Regiment of Foot Artillerists, another of Horse Artillerists, and a third of Engineers.

It is conceived, that the entire union of the officers of artillerists and engineers, in one corps, as in our present establishment, is not advisable. The art of fortification, and the service of artillery, though touching each other in many points, are, in the main, distinct branches, and each so comprehensive, that their separation is essential to perfection in either. This has been ascertained by long experience. Among the powers of Europe, there is not one recollected, which, at the present day, is not conscious of this truth. When any of them have attempted to unite these corps, the disadvantages which resulted were soon felt to be so momentous, as to produce conviction that each required a separate organization. Such an union was once attempted in France.

According to an ordinance of the 8th of December, 1755, the artillery and engineer corps of that nation, which had been separate, were combined into one. The experiment, however, was of short duration. In 1758, the engineer corps was disjoined from the corps of artillery, and called, as before, the corps of engineers; since which time these corps have remained separate.

The two regiments of artillerists and engineers consist of the following officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates; each of, viz:

1 Lieutenant Colonel Commandant,	32 Cadets,
4 Majors,	4 Sergeant Majors,
1 Adjutant,	4 Quartermaster Sergeants.
1 Quartermaster, } each being a Lieutenant.	64 Sergeants,
1 Paymaster,	64 Corporals,
1 Surgeon,	1 Chief Musician,
2 Surgeon's Mates,	10 Musicians,
16 Captains,	123 Artificers,
32 Lieutenants, besides the three above mentioned,	768 Privates.

Let the regiments of foot artillerists and horse artillerists consist each as follows, viz:

1 Lieutenant Colonel Commandant,	24 Cadets.
3 Majors,	3 Sergeant Majors,
1 Adjutant,	3 Quartermaster Sergeants,
1 Quartermaster, } each being a Lieutenant.	48 Sergeants,
1 Paymaster,	48 Corporals,
1 Surgeon,	1 Chief Musician,
2 Surgeon's Mates,	12 Musicians,
12 Captains,	730 Privates, including Artificers.
24 Lieutenants, besides the three above mentioned,

The artificers forming a part of each company in the regiments as they now exist, to form two companies of miners, and two companies of artificers, to be arranged as will be hereafter noticed.

It is also proposed: First. In the event of a war, that these two regiments shall be augmented to the complement of officers and men, composing the existing regiments of artillerists and engineers. Second. That the regiment of horse-artillerists shall perform their service on horseback during war only. Third. That provision be made to enable the President of the United States, in case war shall break out between the United States and a foreign European power, or in case imminent danger of invasion of their territory, by any such power shall, in his opinion, be discovered to exist, to organize, and cause to be organized, two additional regiments of horse artillery. Fourth. That the officers which shall become supernumerary, by this aforesaid organization, shall, at the discretion of the President, be transferred to fill vacancies in other regiments, on the establishment, corresponding with their grades, or be retained to fill appropriate vacancies which shall happen in their respective regiments, by deaths, resignations, &c.

In addition to the economical effect of the latter arrangement, it may be mentioned, that the officers to one whole battalion of the Second Regiment of Artillerists and Engineers have not yet been appointed.

The regiment of engineers consisting entirely of officers, if we exclude the companies of miners, it remains to speak of its organization.

Let it consist of, viz:

Two Lieutenant Colonels, one first and one second,
as already provided by law.
Three Majors,
Twelve Captains,

Twenty-four First Lieutenants,
Twenty-four Second Lieutenants,
Twenty-four Cadets.

The companies of miners and their labors to be under the direction and immediate command of officers of this corps, and to make a part thereof.

It will be perceived, and it is observed with regret, that, the engineer regiment cannot be immediately formed, by the mere act of transferring into it officers from any of the existing regiments. In order to answer its high destination, it must be filled slowly, and under the exercise of great caution and responsibility.

For this purpose, selections may be made from among the officers of the army, and others who shall have passed through the military schools, and prescribed examinations, and obtain certificates of their possessing the requisite knowledge and qualifications.

It may also be permitted, in cases of uncommon urgency, requiring the completion of the corps, to choose officers among our citizens, whose professions or functions are most analogous to those of engineers, after an examination made by a special commission named by the President.

But let it be remembered, that this corps is too essential to the success of military operations, to be hurried in its formation, or composed of other than persons qualified to discharge its high and important functions. Is authority necessary to support this truth? A general, of the first reputation as a commander, observes on this subject, in speaking to his Government of an officer, who had been killed in action, "He was the best officer of engineers, a body on which so much of the success of campaigns and the fate of a country depend, and where the least fault may be attended with the most fatal consequences."

The horse artillery being a subject that cannot fail to attract attention, it will not, it is conceived, be deemed superfluous to submit a few observations and facts, relative to its structure, advantages, and importance.

The Prussians were the first who employed horse artillery, invented by the great Frederick, at a time, when the league which was formed against him, called upon his genius to multiply his resources. It was then, that the same army, transported with a celerity and precision, till then unknown in war, was seen to triumph against superior forces during the same campaign, upon opposite frontiers, to the East and to the West of his states. It was then were seen horse artillery accompanying strong advanced bodies of cavalry without embarrassing, or retarding, their rapid marches and evolutions.

Horse artillery was introduced into the Austrian army during the reign of Joseph II., but it was not made a principal object, and remained in a state of imperfection. The cannoners were transported upon the ridges of covered caissons, stuffed in the attitude of men on horseback. These carriages were called Wurst-wagen.

Some attempts were made in France to introduce the horse artillery before the revolution there; the subject, however, was not well understood; the general officers, who were present at the attempt, proposed to place the cannoners, like the Austrians, on Wursts.

In 1791, Mr. Duportail, Minister of War, authorized the commandant of the division of Mity to form two companies of horse artillery. The success of this experiment was decisive, and answerable to the minister's expectations. The officers and men were in a few weeks in a condition to manœuvre with light troops.

In 1792, Mr. Narbonne, who succeeded to Mr. Duportail, composed a committee of the most enlightened officers of the army, to examine and decide upon the means of improving and extending, in the French army, the use of horse artillery.

As no better idea can be given of this new military arm, than what is reported of the result of this conference, the Secretary takes the liberty to introduce it.

These officers resolved, as fundamental points—

1. That a numerous horse artillery well served, and kept complete in cannoners and horses, was the most certain mean to protect the evolutions of troops indifferently instructed, to support their attack with bayonets, and to render null, by positions seasonably taken and with celerity, the advantage which troops better disciplined, might confidently promise themselves from superiority in manœuvres.

2. That with respect to the employment of this arm, the rules of service, instruction, &c. the horse artillery ought to differ from the field artillery only, in having its pieces so managed, as to be drawn with the utmost celerity wherever they can produce the greatest effect, and in the cannoners being able to follow their guns, and commence action as soon as they are placed.

3. That to fulfil this object, it is more convenient to have the cannoners all mounted on horses, than a part of them on wursts, because on horses they are less subject to accidents, their movement more rapid, their retreat more secure, and the replacing of horses easy.

4. That without excluding any caliber, it appears pieces carrying balls of eight and twelve pounds, and howitzers, may be most advantageously employed.

5. That it is unnecessary to discipline a horse artillerist in the manœuvres of cavalry; that this would be a departure, without utility, from the principal object; that it is enough for him to know to sit firm on his horse, to mount and descend quickly, and conduct him boldly; that it is not requisite to oblige him to preserve any order in following his piece, leaving it to his intelligence to learn, if he chooses, to execute the manœuvres of cavalry.

6. That the manœuvre, à la prolonge, ought to be employed in every case in which it is practicable to use it. That the horses remaining attached while the pieces are firing, one gains thereby all the time which would be lost in removing or replacing the avant train, and thus one may pass fosses and rivers with the utmost celerity, and profit of positions.

7. That in order to form at once a requisite number of companies of horse artillery, without weakening the artillery regiments, it is sufficient to employ for every piece two skilful cannoners, and to draw upon the infantry for the rest.

On these principles the French have organized an establishment in their armies, from which they have derived the most important advantages in most, if not all their campaigns.

The decisive agency of horse artillery in offensive war was manifested in the invasion of Belgium, by General Dumouriez, at the end of his campaign in 1792. The affair of Waterloo is equally in point, as to its superiority in defensive operations.

Whilst General Pichegru commanded the army of Flanders, four thousand cavalry, manœuvring with his horse artillery, sustained the immense effort of an army of thirty thousand men, supporting an artillery chiefly of a different kind, of at least triple the force of that opposed to it.

Bonaparte, at the battle of Castiglione, after raising the siege of Mantua, having re-assembled several divisions of his horse artillery in a well chosen position, under General Domartin, broke, by their means, the Austrian line, and thus decided a victory upon which depended the most important consequences in his favor.

It is also certain, that the horse artillery contributed not a little to gain the battle of Etingen, where General Morart, very inferior in cavalry, maintained, by its means, his left wing against the whole cavalry of the Arch Duke. The application of the horse artillery procured to General Hoche, upon the Rhine, in the late affair of Newied, like success.

The Arch Duke Charles, instructed by such events, has greatly augmented and improved this arm of the Austrian army. The English, also, have lately introduced horse artillery into their service, but, it is supposed, too sparingly to derive therefrom its full effect.

Can an agent, so superior in all offensive and defensive operations, and so vastly important from its nature, as well as the use made of it by other nations, be dispensed with in the composition of our army, or neglected with impunity?

The author of a recent work, entitled "Précis des évènements militaires," published in numbers at Hamburg, from which most of the aforesaid facts respecting this powerful military agent have been taken, observes, "that it is become indispensable in all armies; it can accompany almost every where cavalry; it crosses rivers and morasses impassable to foot artillery; it thunders in mass and with great rapidity upon an unexpected point of attack; turns a body of the enemy; takes him in flank or rear; can perform the service of advance posts; of artillery position; of the rear guard; and, in fine, that of a corps of reserve, from which detachments may be made as wanted: it is free from the inconvenience ascribed to foot artillery, of retarding and restraining the manœuvres and marches of troops: the French have, therefore, already confined the use of foot artillery to the service of sieges, with the exception of four pounders, which they have yet left attached to battalions."

Horse artillery would seem to be peculiarly recommended to the United States by the reflection, that all attacks on the sea-board must be made by an enemy, water borne from a distant country, who will consequently be ill provided with horses, whereas, the United States, having a knowledge of this agent, and resorting to their resources in horses, might be able to oppose a horse artillery so superior and so promptly, as to give decided advantages in attack or defence, and relieve their territory from being ravaged, or long possessed in any part of it. If the United States shall prevent an enemy from procuring the horses of the country, and shall maintain a superiority in this forcible arm, they will have little to fear from invaders, however powerful in infantry.

The two regiments of artists and engineers, as they now stand on the establishment, cost the United States four hundred and twenty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty three dollars and eighty cents annually. There will result from the proposed arrangement of these regiments, as will appear by Schedule A. a difference in time of peace of twenty thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirty cents annually, which sum may be applied to the expenses of the Military Academy.

When the preceding propositions are respectfully submitted, as essential to the improvement of our military establishment, it would be improper to overlook such other measures as may occur, and, it is believed, would conduce to perfect our preparations, for securing our rights.

The importance of the volunteer associations or companies, which may be accepted under "An Act authorizing the President to raise a provisional army," passed the 28th May, 1798, has heretofore been presented by the Secretary. They may be considered as a reserve body, from which prompt and efficient reinforcements can be drawn, to our regular army, and as rallying and supporting points, when completely organized into regiments, brigades, and divisions, for the militia, in all cases of great and comprehensive urgency or danger.

A revision of the law respecting these valuable associations, is earnestly recommended. No other force being so economical, will it not be proper, in order to derive full and permanent utility from the volunteer companies in all hazardous conjunctures, that the power of the President to accept their patriotic offers of service should no longer be confined to a limited period, and that the duration only of their engagements, after acceptance, should be defined by law. Can a time be fairly presumed to arrive, when we can have nothing to apprehend from either foreign or domestic enemies?

An omission in the law to provide the same compensation to the volunteer cavalry, for the use of their horses, that is allowed to militia cavalry, when in actual service, has been felt, with some sensibility, by the former, who were employed during the last insurrection in the same service with militia cavalry. It is, therefore, recommended that an appropriation be made for compensating the volunteer cavalry so employed, for the use of their horses, during their service, at the same rates of allowance, which have been paid to the militia cavalry on the same service; and that equal rates of compensation for the future shall be provided for both by law, for the use of their horses in actual service.

The militia of the United States ought to be considered as an essential arm of our defence, and a sure resource from which reinforcements may be drawn to supply deficiencies in the regular army, in the event of a sudden invasion, or the wasting progress of a long war.

To obtain their aid, however, with celerity and order, in such cases, other provisions are necessary than are to be found at present in the laws.

The act of the 28th of February, 1795, authorizes the President, whenever the United States shall be invaded, or in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, to call forth such numbers of militia of the state, or states adjoining, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for the purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper.

To give effect to this power, and enable the President to carry upon an enemy with promptitude the force nearest to, or best calculated to, annoy him, it is indispensable that he should know the number and species of militia in each county of a State, and the names and places of residence of their officers respectively.

If these particulars are not precisely known to the President, at the time the force is wanted, the delay which must necessarily intervene in the circuitous course of orders and instructions, will often, if not always, be productive of disastrous consequences. To avoid these, the proper officer of the militia in each State should be obliged, by heavy penalties, and high responsibility, to make quarterly returns to the Department of War, comprehending the aforesaid particulars.

The troops raised under, and conformably to the provisions of "An act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 16th July, 1798, demand, at this time, particular attention.

This additional force was to consist of twelve regiments of infantry, and six troops of cavalry, the latter intended, with the two troops of cavalry, heretofore, and now, in service, to form one regiment of cavalry. For the infantry, the officers have been appointed, and the recruiting service some time in operation. For the cavalry, the officers have also been appointed; but, to avoid the expense of this kind of troops, which is always much greater than that of any species of foot, the recruiting service has not been ordered, as yet, into operation, nor have horses been purchased, although preparatory measures have been taken.

For the twelve regiments of infantry, the enlistments amount as follows, according to the last returns which have been received by the department.

For the fifth regiment, which is the first of the twelve, there has been no returns.

Returned for the sixth regiment, enlisted in North Carolina, from August to December, 1799, viz: 134.

For the seventh, enlisted in Virginia, from May to the first Monday in November, 1799, viz: 258.

For the eighth, enlisted in Virginia, from May to October the 1st, 1799, viz: 424.

For the ninth, enlisted in Maryland, from May to September the 17th, 1799, viz: 314.

For the tenth, enlisted in Pennsylvania, from May to August the 1st, 1799, viz: 448.

For the eleventh, enlisted in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, from April to the first Monday in October, 1799, viz: 458.

For the twelfth, enlisted in New York, from May to the first Monday in September, 1799, viz: 287.

For the thirteenth, enlisted in Connecticut, from May to the first Monday in November, 1799, viz: 371.

For the fourteenth, enlisted in Massachusetts, from May to the first Monday in November, 1799, viz: 327.

For the fifteenth, enlisted in Massachusetts, Maine, from June to the first Monday in November, 1799, viz: 145.

For the sixteenth, enlisted in New Hampshire, from July to the first Monday in November, 1799, viz: 233.

Total enlisted, 3,399.

Agreeably to the provisions of the act of the 16th July, 1798, all these troops have been, by the terms of their respective enlistments, engaged "for and during the continuance of the existing differences between the United States and the French Republic."

The Secretary thinks it necessary to mention that, immediately upon the accommodation of the existing differences aforesaid, the engagements of all these troops will expire, and every man be entitled to demand his discharge. That, in consequence, if it shall be deemed expedient to keep up a peace establishment, more extended than here-before, or any events should intervene to render a larger army indispensable, it will not be practicable to apply one of these men to the same, who have already received a bounty, without a re-enlistment, and the expense of a new bounty.

It is, therefore, thought advisable, that the terms of enlistment prescribed by the law be superceded by a provision in future to enlist for the term of five years, if not sooner discharged. This modification leaves with the President the power of reducing the numbers of the army at any time, to a prescribed establishment, and if the negotiations of our envoys to the French republic shall be successful, it will procure a number of men, who, without additional expense, can be retained, if necessary, in service, for the period mentioned, a measure which appears equally recommended by its policy and economy.

The Secretary has before observed, that if the United States shall prevent an enemy from procuring the horses of the country, and maintain a superiority in horse artillery, they will have little to fear from an invading enemy, however powerful in infantry. It certainly would be an important addition to our system of defence, was an arrangement devised, to deprive an enemy, as much as possible, after he had effected a landing upon our coast, of the means of subsistence, and especially to prevent him from possessing himself of horses, indispensable to the transport of his baggage, stores, and provisions, and for his artillery and cavalry.

An operation promising to be so efficient, and sanctioned by experience in other countries, will perhaps require, on the part of Government, a promise of indemnification to the individual, for the value of all stock and horses which may be removed in consequence of invasion, if not restored to their respective owners.

Provisions and restrictions, it is conceived, may be made, calculated to secure the public against frauds, and to encourage, at the same time, the aid of proprietors themselves in the execution of such a law. It should explicitly provide, that no compensation will ever be allowed for property of the kind described, destroyed either by the enemy, or by our own army, to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy; in all cases, where it shall appear no previous preparation or exertion had been made use of to remove it, and authorize the destruction of all stock, and horses in particular, left in an exposed situation, when necessary, to prevent their being useful to an enemy, or employed against the armies of the United States.

The Government of a country, blessed with every convenience for an extensive foreign trade, and peopled with inhabitants distinguished for their commercial spirit, will, from the natural operation of circumstances, and the impulse given by its citizens, consider it a duty to prepare either gradually or promptly, as policy, interest, or necessity may dictate, the means of affording protection to its property on the ocean.

We find accordingly the foundation of a navy already laid, and its advantages so far felt as to induce a belief its progress will be permitted to keep pace with the purposes for which it was instituted. This navy, however, which is specially intended to protect trade, will in its turn require to be protected, when in harbor, by suitable fortifications. Without a place of safety, to which it may retire from a superior fleet, the labors and resources of years may be destroyed in a single hour.

The fortifications erected for the defence of our cities and harbors cannot yet be considered competent to afford this security. Many new and extensive works, even at those places where the fortifications are advanced, will yet be required to render any of them a secure asylum for our navy.

Whenever, therefore, the harbors in which our dock yards and great naval depositories are to be established, and to which our navy may retire in time of war or danger, shall be determined upon, it will be indispensable to make them impregnable, if possible, to an enemy.

Schedule B will show the sums which have been appropriated and annually expended in fortifying our harbors, since the "act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States," passed the 20th March, 1794, and the balance remaining on the 1st October, 1799.

The Paymaster General of the Armies of the United States has been, agreeably to the provision of the 15th section of "an act for the better organization of the troops of the United States, and for other purposes," quartered by direction of the late commander in chief, at the seat of Government, it being the station deemed most proper, to enable him to perform his functions with convenience, facility, and the least probable risk of the public moneys.

The functions of this office are, by law, highly important: his trust is eminently responsible. All moneys for the pay of the armies pass through his hands, including military bounties, and the subsistence and forage of officers, and he is the auditor, in the first instance, of all accounts for such objects.

The compensation provided for him is eighty dollars per month, with the rations and forage of a major. This compensation the Secretary conceives, not merely inadequate to remunerate the duties and responsibilities attached to the office, but insufficient for the decent support of a respectable character, and certainly none other should fill it.

It is, therefore, respectfully suggested to increase the compensation to the Paymaster General of the Armies of the United States, and submitted whether it might not be attended with some beneficial effects to vest him with a suitable brevet rank in the army.

The regularity, discipline, and, of course, the efficiency of all armies have always depended very essentially upon the system provided for their government. Impressed with this conviction, the Secretary takes the liberty to bring into your view, "the rules and articles for the better government of the troops raised, or to be raised, and kept in pay, by and at the expense of the United States of America." This system contains many excellent provisions, but experience has produced a pretty general wish among military men, that it could be submitted to a complete revision, as in many particulars it is presumed to require amendments.

This revision would be a very serious work, and there is reason to fear could not be undertaken, with a prospect of being speedily finished. Some things, however, can be done, which would be important improvements.

A great obscurity envelopes the provisions of the existing articles, respecting the power to appoint or order general courts martial. One construction, by confining the power to the general or commander in chief only, is inconveniently narrow, and has occasioned too great delay, as well in instituting courts, as in giving effect to their sentences. Another construction, which has been practised upon, (commandants of posts, as such, of whatever grade, having assumed the power of constituting general courts martial) is too much diffused, and would place in too many hands a trust no less delicate than important.

To attempt to attain the proper medium by a more exact legislative definition, of the characters who may exercise the power, would perhaps be attended with difficulty, and might often not meet the new situations which are constantly occurring in the infinite combinations of military service. The expedient which has appeared most proper, is to give a discretionary authority to the President, to empower other officers, (than those the soundest interpretation has decided to be designated by the articles of war, viz. generals, or those on whom a general's command has devolved) to appoint general courts martial, under such circumstances, and with such limitations, as he may deem advisable.

The provisions which refer the determination on sentences extending to the loss of life, or the dismissal of a commissioned officer in time of peace, to the President, must no doubt have frequently been attended with perplexity to him, and are inconvenient, if not injurious to the service. It is scarcely possible, for any but the military commander, to appreciate duly the motives which, in such cases, demand severity, or recommend clemency. To this, an accurate view of all the circumstances of the army, in detail, is often necessary. The efficacy of punishment, when requisite in an army, depends much on its celerity, and must be greatly weakened by the unavoidable delay of a resort to the Executive: during which delay, the mischief it was intended to remedy, may, and sometimes most probably will, have happened. The reasons mentioned induce an opinion, that it is expedient to empower the commanding general of an army, to decide upon, and command to be executed when proper, all sentences of general courts martial, except only such as respect a general officer. The responsibility of the commanding general to the President, and to his country, must ensure a discreet exercise of the required authority, and its utility is manifest.

The best mode of treating the crime of desertion has been an embarrassing investigation in most countries. To fix upon a punishment, that gives the surest promise of checking or preventing the evil, or which, when it does happen, in its application will be most analogous to the generally received opinions of a country, and the habits of military life, is indeed difficult. The same punishment ought not, perhaps, to be applied to this crime, the most injurious to armies, and complicated in its nature, at all times and under all circumstances.

To punish it with death in time of peace in all cases, would, in this country, do violence to the popular habits of thinking. Whipping is found to be ineffectual. Confinement to hard labor, it is supposed, will produce more beneficial results, and courts martial have, in their discretion, been lately much influenced by this belief. As, however, our soldiers are enlisted for given periods, when an engagement is nearly expired, confinement would be an inadequate punishment, for it could not continue beyond the term of service, and although a soldier may be supposed to have fewer inducements to withdraw from an engagement which is near terminating, yet, it has sometimes happened, and may be expected in future, that men, under such circumstances, have been the authors of combinations, to revolt, desert, and commit other crimes, consequently have been the most atrocious offenders; and it is known that they frequently have themselves deserted. To make this punishment, then, in time of peace, in all cases, commensurate with, and proportioned to, the crime, an auxiliary provision to extend the confinement and labor beyond the period of service the criminal had engaged for, would appear necessary. Such a provision would have a tendency to render the sentences of the courts less sanguinary.

The Secretary by no means designs to suggest, that it would be proper to abolish the punishment of death for desertion even in time of peace. He considers that in aggravated and complicated cases, it would always be proper, and that in time of war or civil commotion, it should always be applied to this crime. He also inclines to the opinion, that the power of pardoning ought never to be extended in any instance of desertion, or an attempt to desert to enemies or traitors.

Connected with the perfection of our military establishment, is a code of well digested rules for the formations, field exercise, movements, and police, of the different species of troops composing our army.

Major General Hamilton has, some time since, been specially charged with this work. As it was not, however, expected that so extensive an undertaking could be completed without a sub-division of labor, and the co-operation of various talents and experience, he informs, that he has assigned to Major General Pinckney an important portion of the task. The execution, it is also understood, will require the aid of other and subordinate officers, for whose extra service a special compensation is suggested, as being agreeable to usage, and essential to a cheerful and zealous performance of their duty. This, should it meet your approbation, demands no particular act of the Legislature.

There is another point relative to the army, which he has made the subject of a recent communication to the Department of War, to which it may be proper to request attention.

The General observes, that "the detaching from their corps soldiers as servants to the various officers of the general staff is productive of material inconvenience, by withdrawing altogether, from military service, a considerable number of persons; and occasioning dissatisfactions to the commandants of corps, who never see their men removed without uneasiness, and are sometimes much disgusted by the selection of those whom they are anxious to retain. There is no doubt, he adds, that it would operate beneficially, if, after fixing the number of servants to which the several characters of the general staff should be entitled, they were to be allowed an equivalent in money, regulated by the cost of a soldier to the public, and were to be required to provide their own servants."

Should this measure be adopted, which is agreeable to an obsolete regulation of the old Congress, penalties may be devised to secure a faithful execution, which, from the force of circumstances, would be very little liable to abuse.

When treating upon military subjects, it may not be improper to give a general view of the positions of the existing regular force, composing the armies of the United States, conformably to a disposition of the same by your approbation, and that of the late commander in chief.

The four regiments of infantry, and the two companies of cavalry, on the permanent establishment, are disposed of as follows:

One regiment is assigned to the frontiers of Tennessee and Georgia. There are also in that quarter the two companies of cavalry.

The three other regiments are distributed along the lakes from Niagara to Michillimackinac, upon the Miami, Ohio, Mississippi, and Tombigbee.

There is also one battalion of the artillery and engineers distributed with the aforesaid troops.

This entire force is manifestly inadequate to the purposes it is intended to answer on our Northern, Western, and Southern frontiers.

The twelve regiments of infantry now raising, have taken, or are to take, the following provisional positions, viz:

Three of the twelve regiments of infantry in the vicinity of Providence river, near Uxbridge, Massachusetts.

Three regiments in the vicinity of Brunswick, New Jersey.

Three regiments in the vicinity of Potomac, near Harper's Ferry, Virginia.

Three regiments in the vicinity of Augusta, above the Falls of Savannah.

This disposition, it is conceived, combines considerations relative to the discipline and health of the troops with the economical supply of their wants. It has, also, some military aspects, in the first instance, towards the security of Boston and Newport; in the second, towards that of New York and Philadelphia; in the third and fourth, towards that of Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, and the Southern States generally, and in the third, particularly towards the reinforcement of the Western army.

The residue of the two regiments of artillery and engineers, except one battalion stated to be on our Northern, Western, and Southern frontiers, are stationed in our sea-board fortifications, from Portland, Massachusetts, to the St. Mary's, Georgia. From these are to be drawn two battalions in succession for the army, when in the field, with a view to a course of regular instruction.

Schedule C exhibits the actual force (according to the latest returns) of the four regiments of infantry, and two companies of cavalry on the old establishment, and the two regiments of artillery and engineers.

All which is respectfully submitted.

[1st Session.]

MILITARY ACADEMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 13, 1800.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 31, 1800.

SIR:

I have the honor to submit, in compliance with your requisition, a few supplementary observations, and a view of the probable expense of the military schools respectfully recommended to consideration in my report, communicated to Congress, by a message dated the 13th instant, from the President of the United States.

The report contemplates certain military schools as an essential mean, in conjunction with a small military establishment, to prepare for, and perpetuate to, the United States, at a very moderate expense, a body of scientific officers and engineers, adequate to any future exigency, qualified to discipline for the field, in the shortest time, the most extended armies, and to give the most decisive and useful effects to their operations.

It is not conceived the United States will ever think it expedient to employ militia upon their frontiers, or to garrison their fortified places in time of peace, nor that they will be disposed to place their reliance, for defence, against a foreign invading enemy, upon militia alone, but that they will, at all times, maintain a body of regular troops, commensurate with their ability to maintain them, and the necessity or policy that may demand such an establishment.

To qualify and keep our citizens, in general, of suitable bodily ability, prepared to take the field against regular forces, would demand the most radical changes in our militia system, and such an uninterrupted series of training, discipline, and instruction, to be applied, as well to the officers as to the men, as comports with regular troops only, while in its results the measure would be found, on account of the loss to the community, occasioned by the abstraction from labor or occupation, and direct cost, greatly to exceed in expense what would be required to support a moderate military establishment. This position, which is thought to be a sound one, does not bring into view the effects of the measure upon the morals, industry, and habits of the citizens.

Practically considered, may we not as well calculate to be commodiously lodged, and have the science of building improved, by employing every man in the community in the construction of houses, and by exploding from society, as useless, architects, masons, and carpenters, as expect to be defended efficiently from an invading enemy, by causing every citizen to endeavor to make himself master of the several branches of the art of war, and excluding engineers, scientific officers, and regular troops.

There is certainly, however, a system, as it respects our militia, which, if resorted to, and persevered in, may secure the utility of their services in times of danger, without much injury to the morals, or materially affecting the general industry of the nation.

When the perfect order, and exact discipline, which are essential to regular troops, are contemplated, and with what ease and precision they execute the different manœuvres indispensable to the success of offensive or defensive operations, the conviction cannot be resisted, that such troops will always have a decided advantage over more numerous forces composed of un instructed militia or undisciplined recruits.

It cannot yet be forgotten, that, in our Revolutionary war, it was not until after several years practice in arms, and the extension of the periods for which our soldiers were at first enlisted, that we found them at all qualified to meet in the field of battle those to whom they were opposed. The occasional brilliant and justly celebrated acts of some of our militia, during that eventful period, detract nothing from this dear bought truth. With all the enthusiasm which marked those days, it was perceived, and universally felt, that regular and disciplined troops were indispensable, and that it was utterly unsafe for us to trust to militia alone the issue of the war. The position, therefore, is illustrated, that, even in times of the greatest danger, we cannot give to our militia that degree of discipline, or to their officers that degree of military science, upon which a nation may safely hazard its fate.

The great man who conducted the war of our Revolution was continually compelled to conform his conduct to the circumstances growing out of the experimental lessons just mentioned. What was the secret of his conduct? Must it be told? It may, and without exciting a blush or uneasy sensation in any of his surviving companions in arms. He had an army of men, but he had few officers or soldiers in that army. Both were to be formed, which could not be effected in a single campaign, or while his regiments were continually returning home, and, like the waves of the sea, each in their turn lost in the abyss, and succeeded by new ones. It was not till after he was furnished with a less fluctuating and more stable kind of force, that he could commence, with a prospect of advantage, military instructions, or enforce the ordinances of discipline; and, even then, he felt that time and instructors were required to render his labors useful, and enable his army to meet the enemy upon any thing like equal terms. Are we to profit by, or is this experience to be lost to our country?

The art of war, which gives to a small force the faculty to combat with advantage superior numbers, indifferently instructed, is subjected to mechanical, geometrical, moral, and physical rules; it calls for profound study; its theory is immense; the details infinite; and its principles rendered useful only by a happy adaptation of them to all the circumstances of place and ground, variously combined, to which they may be applicable. Is it possible for an officer of militia to obtain a competent knowledge of these things in the short space his usual avocations will permit him to devote to their acquisition? Is it possible for any officer, having acquired a knowledge of these details, this theory, and these principles, to carry them into useful practice with a handful of militia, in the few days in each year allotted by law to trainings and exercises? Is that perfect subordination and obedience of men to their officers, and of each inferior to his superior officer, through all the grades of rank from the corporal up to the commander in chief, which forms a vital principle essential to the energy and force of armies, to be acquired by, or communicated to, a body of militia organized and trained according to our laws? And does it consist with a humane and enlightened policy to march men so imperfectly instructed and disciplined, unless in cases of the last extremity, against veteran troops, (where this principle reigns in full activity) commanded by skilful and scientific officers? Admitting, however, that militia officers, during the few months the law permits their corps to be retained in actual service, could render their men, by incessant instruction, capable of fulfilling the object of their destination; yet, as that advantage is but momentary, as these borrowed instruments must be quickly returned to the depot which furnished them, as new ones must be resorted to, and successively instructed, what can be expected from such a system, but perpetual incoherence between the means and the end, and certain shipwreck to the best connected and combined military projects. This, to be sure, is the old story—it cannot, however, be too often repeated, because it can never be refuted.

The secret of discipline, and the importance of military science, were well known to those ancient Governments whose generals and troops have filled the world with the splendor of their victories. According to Scipio, nothing contributed to the success of enterprises so much as skill in the individual officers. The severity of the Roman discipline is well understood, and the estimation in which it was held by Cæsar. Livy has observed, that science does more in war than force. Vegelius, that it is neither numbers nor blind valor which ensures victory, but that it generally follows capacity and science in war. Machiavel, who has written upon military affairs, placed so much dependence on an exact discipline and military science, as to efface from his list of great generals all those who with small armies did not execute great things: but to the committee it is unnecessary to repeat the authorities of generals and writers of the first reputation, to show the high importance attached to military science and discipline in all ages of the world, or resort to history for evidence of its effects. They must be well acquainted with the facts, and, no doubt, will give them their due weight, in considering the subjects now before them.

There is, however, an authority, so much in point relative to the essentiality of the institution in question, that I cannot forbear to mention it.

The Marshal de Puisegur, who has left an excellent treatise on the art of war, the result of his experience, observes:

"I have been, perhaps, at as many sieges as any of those in service, and in all sorts of grades; as subaltern, I have commanded troops and working parties in a siege; as major, I have conducted to the trenches and posts to which they were destined, troops and laborers; I have been major of brigade, marshal de camp, and lieutenant general; however, as I have not learned fortification, my practice has not enabled me to acquit myself in conducting attacks, so that I should be obliged to suffer myself to be instructed in many things by the lights of engineers, their practice being founded upon principles which are known to them, an advantage I have not in this branch of war."

This is the candid acknowledgment of a man who had served sixty years in the army; who had learned the military art under a father; that, in forty years service, had been present at two hundred sieges; and who had himself passed through all the military grades, and arrived from an inferior to a superior rank, but after having deserved each successive promotion by some distinguished action.

A slight attention to circumstances, and the actual position of our country, must lead to the conviction, that a well connected series of fortifications is an object of the highest importance to the United States, not only as these will be conducive to the general security, but as a mean of lessening the necessity, and consequently the expense of a large military establishment.

By strongly fortifying our harbors and frontiers, we may reasonably expect, either to keep at a distance the calamities of war, or render it less injurious when it shall happen. It is behind these ponderous masses only, that a small number of men can maintain themselves, for a length of time, against superior forces. Imposing, therefore, upon an enemy, who may have every thing to transport across the Atlantic, the necessity of undertaking long and hazardous sieges, increases the chances against his undertaking them at all, or, if he does, in despite of such circumstances, insures to us the time he must consume in his operations, to rally our means to a point, and unite our efforts to resist him.

We must not conclude, from these brief observations, that the services of the engineer is limited to constructing, connecting, consolidating, and keeping in repair fortifications. This is but a single branch of their profession, though, indeed, a most important one. Their utility extends to almost every department of war, and every description of general officers, besides embracing whatever respects public buildings, roads, bridges, canals, and all such works of a civil nature. I consider it, therefore, of vast consequence to the United States, that it should form in its own bosom, and out of its own native materials, men qualified to place the country in a proper posture of defence, to infuse science into our army, and give to our fortifications that degree of force, connexion, and perfection, which can alone counterbalance the superiority of attack over defence.

With these advantages in prospect, is it not incumbent upon us to hasten, with all reasonable diligence, the commencement and completion of an institution essential to realise them. And are expenditures, which give such valuable results, to be otherwise viewed than as real economy? It is a well known fact, that England had neither native artillerymen nor engineers before the time of the Duke of Cumberland, and till after she established military schools.

I shall now, having respectfully submitted these observations, present an estimate of the expense of the military schools, which it appears to me ought to be immediately instituted.

Agreeably to the plan of the Military Academy, the directors thereof are to be officers taken from the army, consequently no expense will be incurred by such appointments.

The plan also contemplates that officers of the army, cadets, and non-commissioned officers, shall receive instruction in the academy. As the rations and fuel which these are entitled to in the army, will suffice for them in the academy, no additional expense will be required for these objects of maintenance while there.

The expenses of servants, and certain incidental charges relative to the police and administration, may be defrayed, by those who shall be admitted, out of their pay and emoluments.

According to the plan contemplated, fifty officers, cadets, or non-commissioned officers, may be annually instructed in the Fundamental School, and an equal number in the School of Artillerists and Engineers; the only schools which it is deemed expedient to bring into operation.

To instruct these may require, when both schools are in full activity, the following professors, viz:

In the Fundamental School.

2 Professors of mathematics, at 800 dollars per annum, and two rations per day,	-	$1,848 20
2 do. geography and natural philosophy,	-	1,848 20
1 Professor of chemistry,	-	924 10
1 Designing and drawing master,	-	724 10
		5,344 60

In the School of Artillerists and Engineers.

1 Professor of mathematics, at 800 dollars per annum, and two rations per day,	-	924 10
1 do. geography and natural philosophy,	-	924 10
1 do. chemistry,	-	924 10
1 do. architecture,	-	924 10
2 Designing and drawing masters, at 600 dollars per annum, and two rations per day,	-	1,448 20
		5,144 60

Total, $10,489 20

The cost of the buildings for these two schools, as the one or the other of the annexed plan shall be adopted, will be, viz:

Plan by John Foncin, Engineer.

For the Fundamental School,	-	19,423 00
The School of Artillerists and Engineers, supposed to cost an equal sum,	-	19,423 00
		$38,846 00

Plan by B. H. Latrobe, Civil Architect and Engineer.

For the Fundamental School,	-	40,000 00
The School of Artillerists and Engineers, supposed to cost an equal sum,	-	40,000 00
		$80,000 00

It may be proper to remind the committee, that no appropriation for the School of Engineers and Artillerists will be required perhaps these two years, or till after the completion of the Fundamental School.

The Secretary takes occasion also to mention, that the laws have already made provision for four teachers or professors to the artillerists and engineers, at a salary of eighty dollars per month, and two rations per day, which may be considered equivalent to four thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars and forty-six cents per annum; and that the act providing for raising and organizing a corps of artillerists and engineers, passed the 9th May, 1794, makes it "the duty of the Secretary of War to provide, at the public expense, under such regulations as shall be directed by the President of the United States, the necessary books, instruments, and apparatus, for the use and benefit of the said corps."

According to the plan and estimate of the buildings by Mr. Foncin, the two schools will cost thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and forty-six dollars.

According to the plan and estimate by Mr. Latrobe, the two schools will cost eighty thousand dollars.

The modification of the two regiments of artilleryists and engineers will liberate twenty thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars annually.

The establishment of the two schools will liberate the salaries of the four teachers before mentioned, or four thousand three hundred and thirty-six dollars annually.

The books, apparatus, and instruments, directed to be provided for the use of the artilleryists and engineers, are considered as an adequate offset for the books, apparatus, and instruments, required for the use of the schools; consequently, no charge has been stated in the estimate for these objects.

If, therefore, we oppose the sums thus annually liberated, to the annual salary of the professors, and original cost of the buildings; whichever of the plans is adopted, we shall find the measure proposed, viewed merely in the light of an operation of finance, to result in a considerable saving to the United States.

An individual would think it a good bargain to receive twenty-five thousand two hundred and ninety-one dollars, annually, the sum liberated, and to give, in lieu thereof, ten thousand four hundred and sixty-six dollars, annually, the salary of the professors, and a principal sum, equal to the cost of the buildings. In other words, he would receive fourteen thousand seven hundred and twenty-five dollars, annually, which is equivalent, at six per cent. to a capital, or principal, of two hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and sixteen dollars; a sum greatly exceeding the estimated cost of the buildings, upon either estimate.

The committee, while they perceive that the seed, which it is now proposed to sow, is to yield a future harvest, will, at the same time, justly appreciate the various beneficial consequences which must result from the immediate adoption, and the striking inconveniences, and danger, to be apprehended from a postponement of the measure.

Whether our country is to be plunged into a war, or enjoy, for a length of time, the blessings of peace, and interior tranquility; whether the portentous events which have afflicted Europe, and, in their progress, threatened the United States, are to subside into a settled state of things; whether the blessings of peace, and the customary relations, among the transatlantic powers, are to take place, or, hostilities shall be continued, protracted, and extended, beyond their present limits—in either view, it is equally a suggestion of policy, and wisdom, to improve our means of defence, and give as much perfection as possible to such establishments as may be conceived essential to the maintenance of our rights, and security from insults.

The unavoidable collisions growing out of trade, and the reciprocal restrictions of great commercial states; the apprehensions and jealousies natural to powers possessing contiguous territory; the inefficacy of religion and morality, to control the passions of men, or the interest and ambition of nations; the impossibility, at times, for governments to adjust their differences, or preserve their rights, without making sacrifices more to be dreaded than the hazards and calamities of war—all these considerations, illustrated by volumes of examples, teach the soundness of the axiom, si vis pacem para bellum. And what time more proper to prepare the materials for war, than a time of peace, or more urgent, than that in which a nation is threatened with war.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MCHENRY, Secretary of War.

No. 41.

[1st Session.]

APPOINTMENT AND EMOLUMENTS OF CERTAIN STAFF OFFICERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 21, 1800.

MR. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the committee of claims, to whom was referred the petition of Campbell Smith, made the following report:

That the object of this petition is to obtain compensation for his services as "Judge Marshal and Advocate General to the legion of the United States," from the 16th of July, 1794, until the 13th of July, 1796; and as an extra aid-de camp to Brigadier General Wilkinson, from the 12th of August until the 5th of December in the same year 1794, and from the 16th of January, in the year 1796, until the 31st of December following.

With respect to the last mentioned claim for services as extra aid-de-camp, considering that during the whole of the period in which it is stated he acted in that capacity, Mr. Smith was an officer in the line of the army, and, as such, in the receipt of his pay and emoluments; and, considering that almost the whole of the same period is included within the term wherein it is understood he acted as Judge Advocate, the committee are of opinion, it would not be proper that any further or additional compensation should be made to him as an extra aid-de-camp.

With respect to the other part of the petitioner's claim to compensation as Judge Advocate, &c., the committee find, that, on the 16th of July, 1791, General Wayne, then commanding the troops of the United States, did, by his general orders of that date, give notice that the petitioner was "appointed Judge Marshal and Advocate General to the Legion of the United States, and that he was to be considered and respected accordingly;" and that the petitioner did accept the same appointment, and did discharge the duties thereof as stated in his petition.

Sundry documents tending to elucidate the nature and extent of his claims are hereunto subjoined, and submitted as a part of this report.

Upon a due and attentive consideration of the subject, the committee are of opinion, that the petitioner is justly entitled to relief, and therefore recommend to the House to agree to the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the proper accounting officers of the treasury liquidate and settle the account of Campbell Smith, for his services as Judge Advocate to the Legion of the United States, while he acted in that capacity, under an appointment made by General Wayne, on the 16th of July, 1794; and that he be allowed such pay and emoluments for said services, as are allowed by law to officers acting in that capacity.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 5th February, 1800.

SIR:

In compliance with the request contained in your letter of this date, I transmit, for the information of the committee of claims, copies of all the papers in my possession, relative to the claim of Lieutenant Campbell Smith.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MCHENRY.

HON. DWIGHT FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of Claims.

PHILADELPHIA, 10th February, 1798.

Sir: Relative to the claim of Lieutenant Smith, who was appointed Judge Advocate to the army, by the commanding officer General Wilkinson, in general orders, and who for some time, as it is stated to me, rendered services in that capacity to the United States, it is my opinion he is equitably entitled to compensation for those services. Though General Wilkinson does not, in my opinion, possess the power of appointing the Judge Advocate, as I have seen no act of Congress vesting such power in him, yet as the President of the United States, with the advice of the Senate, has omitted to make the appointment, which omission has been supplied by the commanding officer for the good of the public service, I think the Judge Advocate should be paid for his services, as in any other case not expressly provided for by law, where in justice compensation is due from the United States. For adjusting the quantum payable to Lieutenant Smith for his services as Judge Advocate, no better rule can be suggested, than the allowance fixed by law to this office; and the contingent fund appears to me to be the proper fund for paying this claim.

These principles apply to the case of Lieutenant Webb of the cavalry, who, formerly a captain of the cavalry and deranged, took the command of a company of cavalry by the orders of General Wayne, when there was no other officer holding a commission where the company was. He ought to be paid as captain during the period of this extraordinary service out of the contingent fund.

The claim of Major Cushing is distinguishable from each of the former, as he was appointed Brigade Major and Inspector by General Wilkinson, who ought not to have appointed a field officer to either of these offices, but was directed by law to appoint to these offices out of the captains and subalterns of the line. Yet as these services were necessary, and were rendered, the United States owe a compensation to Major Cushing, which I think may also be paid out of the contingent fund, rather than he should go unpaid.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES LEE.

To the Secretary of War.

NEW YORK, October 25, 1799.

Sir: Lieutenant Campbell Smith has made a representation to me, on the subject of some claims which he has pending in the Accountant's office, and has requested the interposition of my opinion.

Thinking it due to him as an officer now under my command, I trouble you with this letter.

He states that he has claims of two kinds: one for services rendered for more than two years as Judge Advocate, previous to the law authorizing that appointment, another for the legal emoluments of the office, in virtue of an appointment of the commanding General, on the cases of that law; that having been absent in consequence of ill health, induced by a severe wound received in the service, obstacles have occurred to the allowing of the compensation during the term of such absence; that the Attorney General has given an opinion, that the appointment was a regular one under the law, and that he understands this opinion to have been heretofore acted upon by your department.

Upon these data I submit my ideas.

I consider it to be a principle sanctioned by usage, that when an officer is called to exercise in a permanent way an office of skill in the army, (such as that of Judge Advocate,) for which provision is not made by law, he is to receive a quantum meruit, by special discretion, for the time he officiates, which in our present system would be paid out of the fund for the contingencies of the War Department.

This applies to the first claim.

As to the second, this is my opinion—that, considering the appointment as regularly made under the law, the emoluments continue of course, until the office has been abdicated or superseded, the non-exercise of it for any period to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the situation in which Lieutenant Smith was placed by his wound, he would seem entitled even to a liberal application of this rule of right.

With great respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

A. HAMILTON.

The Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 12th November, 1799.

Sir: I received your letter of the 25th ultimo at Trenton, when the business of the office had closed there, and preparations were making to return to the seat of Government.

This letter relates to claims against the United States, for services rendered by Lieutenant Campbell Smith, which are stated to be of two kinds: 1st. For services as Judge Advocate for more than two years previous to the law authorizing that appointment. 2d. For the legal emoluments of the office of Judge Advocate, in virtue of an appointment of the commanding General, on the basis of that law.

The first claim I am not sufficiently informed respecting. No general or special order of appointment appears upon the files of the office. No certificates are presented to show that the duties of the office of Judge Advocate were permanently performed. The circumstances on which its equity is grounded are not before me. If the appointment was not permanent, but applied only to particular cases, and not to all, and did not oblige to perform the duties of the office at every military court, or at least every general court martial, held at or near the army where the officers served, I should apprehend no precedent authorizes the claim, and that its allowance would introduce a train of inconveniences; for, would not every officer who has acted, or shall act, in the same capacity on any military court, and how many have done and are daily doing so, become likewise entitled to the same measure of compensation, for the time he performed, or shall perform, the same duties? In such case, the whole amount of claims equally founded, I can form no estimate of.

As, however, no law sanctions this claim, as to do so would be contrary to past and present practice, unless the duties said to have been enjoined by the appointment were obligatory, permanent, and general; as no expectations have ever been indulged by other officers, who have heretofore or lately acted on military courts in the same office, and the balance of the claim, if for temporary services, would introduce serious inconvenience, I think proper to decline having any thing to do with it.

If, on the other hand, the appointment was intended to be permanent, and to enjoin general duties applicable to all military courts, held at or near the army with which this officer served, although I should then think the claim equitably founded, for compensation for the time services were performed under it, yet, as the appointment was not provided for, and no law established the office, I incline to suppose a legislative allowance would be most regular and conformable to the course heretofore pursued in similar cases, of which Captain Lewis's claim as volunteer aid is an instance.

The second claim is for the legal emoluments of the office of Judge Advocate, in virtue of an appointment of the commanding officer, on the basis of a law authorizing the appointment, relative to which you say it has been stated to you. The Attorney General has given an opinion that the appointment was a regular one, under the law, and that this opinion is understood to have been heretofore acted upon in this department, but that Lieutenant Smith having been absent in consequence of ill health, induced by a severe wound in the service, obstacles have occurred to the allowing of the compensation, during the term of such absence.

Proceeding on the statement made to you as your data, you give your opinion on the second claim as follows, viz: "Considering the appointment as regularly made under the law, the emoluments continue of course, until the office has been abdicated or superseded, the non-exercise of it for any period to the contrary notwithstanding."

It will be proper to go into some detail respecting the second claim, and to show you that the opinion of the Attorney General by no means establishes the appointment of Lieutenant Smith, by the commanding General, on the basis of the law authorizing the appointment of a Judge Advocate as regular, but the contrary. It, however, considers

Lieutenant Smith, under all circumstances, as equitably entitled to compensation, for the services he had actually performed as Judge Advocate, although under an irregular appointment, and recommended the allowance, fixed by law, to this office as the best rule for the compensation, and the contingent as the proper fund out of which it should be paid.

When this claim was presented to me, I transmitted it, with those of two other gentlemen similarly circumstanced, to the Attorney General, and requested his opinion. A copy of this opinion, dated the 10th February, 1798, I now enclose.

On the 12th February, I wrote to the Accountant, "I enclose the opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, on the claims of Lieutenant Campbell Smith, Lieutenant Webb, and Major Cushing. I concur in them."

Referring to the Accountant's office, I find that Lieutenant Smith was settled with, upon the principles of, and agreeably to, the rule recommended by the Attorney General's opinion, from the first of March, 1797, to the 30th of April, 1798.

In consequence of a subsequent application, as I must suppose, by the same officer, referred to me by the Accountant, I wrote to the latter on the 26th of October, 1798—"Lieutenant Campbell Smith is considered, upon the principles of an opinion of the Attorney General, dated 10th February last, copy of which was transmitted to your office, to be entitled to all the emoluments attached to the office of Judge Advocate, for such time only as he was actually employed by Brigadier General Wilkinson, or by orders from the Secretary of War, since the 30th April last, in that capacity."

When I wrote thus, I knew Lieutenant Smith had been employed specially, by a warrant directed to him as Judge Advocate pro hac, on the trial of Lieutenant Parmele, and intended to avoid any expression which could be construed into a confirmation of his appointment to the office of Judge Advocate generally, and to confine his compensation to the time strictly for which he officiated in the capacity of Judge Advocate. No settlement was, however, made with him, after that which allowed him compensation to the 30th April: he probably declined any settlement other than one under his appointment by the General, and giving to him monthly emoluments."

An act to amend and repeal in part the act entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the military establishment of the United States," passed the 3d March, 1797, "Provides, section 2d. That there shall be one Brigadier General, who may choose his Brigade Major and Inspector from the captains and subalterns in the line, (to each of whom there shall be allowed the monthly pay of twenty-five dollars in addition to his pay in the line, and two rations extraordinary per day, and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, to ten dollars per month in lieu thereof,) that there shall be one Judge Advocate, who shall be taken from the commissioned officers of the line, and shall be entitled to receive two rations extra per day, and twenty-five dollars per month, in addition to his pay in the line, and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, to ten dollars per month in lieu thereof."

It will be perceived, that the section of the law cited gives an express permission to the Brigadier General, to choose his Brigade Major and Inspector, but is silent respecting the appointment of the Judge Advocate, which is therefore conceived to rest in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The second clause of the second section of article second of the constitution, among other powers vested in the President, gives that, by and with the advice aforesaid, of appointing "all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of department."

It is proper to add that the nomination to the Senate of an officer to act in the capacity of Judge Advocate General, was declared from a conviction that the dispersed situation that the troops had or would assume, was incompatible with the attainment of much utility from such an officer, and that the same cause produced my disinclination to give any countenance to an expectation of permanent emoluments, under what I consider an irregular appointment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES McHENRY.

Major General A. HAMILTON.

No. 42.

[1st SESSION.]

OFFICERS APPOINTED UNDER THE ACT OF JULY 16, 1798, "TO AUGMENT THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES."

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, APRIL 17, 1800.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In conformity with your request, I transmit you a return, from the War Office, of those officers who have been appointed under the act, entitled "An act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes," designating such officers who have accepted their appointments, and those who have declined accepting, resigned their commissions, died, &c.

A report from the Secretary of War, which accompanied this return, as it contains observations which may throw some light upon the subject, I transmit with it.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, April 17, 1800.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1800.

The Secretary of War, in obedience to the directions of the President, agreeably to a resolution of the Senate, "That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before the Senate a return of all the officers who have been appointed under the act, entitled "An act to augment the army of the United States, and for other purposes," designating such officers who have accepted their appointments, and those who may have declined accepting, or resigned their commissions," has the honor to report the information required:

The Secretary respectfully takes the present occasion to mention, that there are a number of vacancies of the office of second lieutenants in the four old regiments of infantry, and to suggest, that it might be desirable, upon the disbanding of the twelve additional regiments, to fill these vacancies with the most deserving of the disbanded lieutenants. This measure would be particularly gratifying to such of the gentlemen contemplated, as look towards the military as a permanent profession, while it would carry into the old regiments, whatever military knowledge they may have already acquired. But it is proper also to observe, such necessary organs to companies and regiments as second lieutenants, can never long be dispensed with without injury to the service.

The Secretary takes the liberty to represent also, that there are a number of vacancies in the twelve additional regiments of infantry, occasioned by resignations and other incidents, to which the officers next in succession expect to be promoted, and that the uncertain duration of this force, and a principle of economy, has heretofore prevented the Secretary from proposing to the President, in the usual manner, to fill such vacancies by appointments.

As a general rule, the officer next in grade is entitled to a vacant post, and delay in promoting him to it, when not liable to special objection, is considered to be a violation of his right. It also prevents the rise or advance to promotion of all officers who stand below him.

Delay in permitting promotions to vacancies has injurious effects. The officers who are now kept out of their rights believe, that they suffer from the influence of a parsimonious spirit in the Government, and this has a strong tendency to disgust them with the service of their country. For, notwithstanding the officers of the twelve regiments are at least generally informed of the uniform practice of the Department of War, when an officer is advanced to a grade to which he is next in order, and entitled to date his commission on the day the vacancy occurred, and that he is always paid from the date of his commission, which is grounded upon the principle that the officer next in succession is always called upon the moment a vacancy happens, to do the same duty as the officer who before filled it; yet they consider their military career as of uncertain duration, and feel a well grounded apprehension that, if they shall never receive a new commission, the pay and emoluments of a higher grade will never attach to them, although now actually doing the duty of a higher grade.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

JAMES MCHENRY.

Return of the Officers who have been appointed under the act, entitled "An act to augment the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," designating such officers who have accepted their appointments, and those who have declined accepting, resigned their commissions, died, &c.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 5, 1800.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's speech as relates to "a system of national defence, commensurate with our resources and the situation of our country," made the following report:

That it is expedient to make a further appropriation for the fortification of the ports and harbors of the United States, and therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be appropriated, for the present year, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States, in aid of the sums heretofore appropriated for that purpose, and remaining unexpended.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 1st, 1800.

SIR:

The schedule, which accompanied my report to the President of the United States, submitted by him to Congress, on the 13th of January, ultimo, exhibits a view of the appropriations and expenditures for the defence of certain ports and harbors of the United States.

There now remains, of the appropriations heretofore made, about thirty-eight thousand dollars, a sum wholly inadequate to complete the works which have been undertaken, and now are progressing.

Without pretending to an accurate estimate of the sums which will be indispensable to complete certain defences, for the harbors of Boston, those in Rhode Island, of Salem, Marblehead, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and the works on Beacon Island, North Carolina, &c. and not knowing what other ports there may be a demand and necessity for fortifying, may it not suffice, to confine the extended grant of moneys, for the purpose of fortifying our ports and harbors, to the probable amount which may be required within the present year, predicated on the average expenditures of the preceding years.

The Secretary, accordingly, respectfully submits an opinion, that it will be proper to appropriate, to the fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, for the year 1800, one hundred thousand dollars,

And has the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES MCHENRY.

The CHAIRMAN of the Committee of Defence.

GENERAL STAFF OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 23, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The enclosed report to me, made by the acting Secretary of War, on the 14th of this month, appears to be so well founded, in all respects, that I recommend it to the consideration of Congress.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, February 20th, 1801.WAR DEPARTMENT, February 14, 1801.

SIR:

Great inconveniences being experienced in the army, from the want of a competent general staff, I conceive it to be my duty to submit the matter to your consideration.

Though the army is at present a small one, the duties of adjutant and inspector general must be performed, and, from the nature of our service, in small detachments, these duties become more laborious than in an army acting in one compact body. At present, an officer in the line of the army resides at the seat of Government for these purposes, but there is no law allowing him any compensation for these extra services. As he is obliged to keep an office, and be constantly employed himself, and also constantly to employ a clerk, it cannot be expected that he can continue to do the duties, without compensation beyond his pay in the line.

Perhaps a sufficient power rests in the Secretary of War to allow him an adequate sum for his extra labor and expenses. But, if this be true, it is a loose discretion, which I conceive ought to be directed by law. It is my opinion, that a law authorizing the appointing of a field officer in the line to perform the duties, and giving him additional compensation for his services, and also giving him an assistant from among the subaltern officers, would promote regularity in the department, discipline in the army, and public economy.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

SAMUEL DEXTER.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 8, 1801.

By message of the President of the United States, of which the following is an extract:

The fortifications of our harbors, more or less advanced, present considerations of great difficulty. While some of them are on a scale sufficiently proportioned to the advantages of their position, to the efficacy of their protection, and the importance of the points within it, others are so extensive, will cost so much in their first erection, so much in their maintenance, and require such a force to garrison them, as to make it questionable what is best now to be done. A statement of those commenced or projected, of the expenses already incurred, and estimates of their future cost, as far as it can be foreseen, shall be laid before you, that you may be enabled to judge whether any alteration is necessary in the laws respecting this subject.

Statement of Moneys applied for the defence of certain Ports and Harbors in the United States, in pursuance of the "Act to provide for the defence of certain Ports and Harbors in the United States," passed the 20th March, 1794, distinguishing the moneys expended for the Fortifications of each Harbor to the 16th November, 1801, inclusive.

[1st SESSION.]

ORDNANCE, ARMS, AND MILITARY STORES, AND AN ESTIMATE OF EXPENSES NECESSARY FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 2, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives :

I now lay before you,

1. A return of ordnance, arms, and military stores, the property of the United States.
2. Returns of muskets and bayonets, fabricated at the armories of the United States, at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, and of the expenditures at those places; and,

3. An estimate of expenditures which may be necessary for fortifications and barracks, for the present year.

Besides the permanent magazines established at Springfield, West Point, and Harper's Ferry, it is thought one should be established in some point convenient for the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; such a point will probably be found near the border of the Carolinas, and some small provision by the Legislature, preparatory to the establishment, will be necessary for the present year.

We find the United States in possession of certain iron mines and works, in the county of Berkeley, and State of Virginia, purchased, as is presumable, on the idea of establishing works for the fabrication of cannon and other military articles by the public. Whether this method of supplying what may be wanted, will be most advisable, or that of purchasing at market, where competition brings every thing to its proper level of price and quality, is for the Legislature to decide; and if the latter alternative be preferred, it will rest for their further consideration, in what way the subjects of this purchase may be best employed or disposed of. The Attorney General's opinion on the subject of the title accompanies this.

There are, in various parts of the United States, small parcels of land which have been purchased, at different times, for cantonments and other military purposes. Several of them are in situations not likely to be accommodated to future purposes. The loss of the records prevents a detailed statement of these, until they can be supplied by inquiry; in the mean time, one of them, containing eighty-eight acres, in the county of Essex, in New Jersey, purchased in 1799, and sold the following year, to Cornelius Vermule and Andrew Codmas, though its price has been received, cannot be conveyed without authority from the Legislature.

I enclose, herewith, a letter from the Secretary of War on the subject of the islands in the lakes and rivers of our Northern boundary, and of certain lands in the neighborhood of some of our military posts, on which it may be expedient for the Legislature to make some provisions.

WASHINGTON, January 25, 1802.

SIR:

It appears that Potts, Wilson, and North, under the firm of George North & Co. having previously purchased of General Lee, on the 7th day of May, 1800, agreed with the United States, to convey to them, in consideration of 42,000 dollars, two hundred and thirty acres of land, or about that quantity, (describing it,) with a furnace, mill, corn mill, houses, improvements, with privileges, &c. and also the right of digging ore; which right they held under General Lee, from Friend's ore bank, the United States being subject to pay the rent of 1000 dollars, annually, to the said Lee, as a rent reserved to him. The consideration money was to be paid by the United States on their receiving a good title to the premises.

Lee, on the same day, by a similar agreement, engaged with the United States to convey to them, by good and sufficient deeds, all his iron ore in a tract of land of about 1600 acres, and on which is a bank of iron ore, called Friend's ore bank, with certain privileges of ways for carrying off the ore, &c. He also agreed to release, or convey, to the United States, his right to the above mentioned annual rent of 1000 dollars, which, by their agreement with North & Co. they were liable to pay to Lee. For, and in consideration of this conveyance, the United States were to pay 24,000 dollars.

On the next day, May the 8th, Lee made and executed to the United States, in pursuance of the agreement above stated, his deed of the premises, with a general warranty, to defend them to the United States against all persons.

In the same year, North & Co. conveyed, by a deed, regularly executed, in pursuance of their agreement, two hundred and twenty-one acres of land, more or less, with their right of digging ore from Friend's ore bank. Both these deeds, or instruments, appear to be properly made and authenticated, and sufficient to vest the premises in the United States, if the several grantors were respectively possessed and seised of the premises, free from incumbrances, at the time when the deeds were executed.

It appears, by the foregoing statements, that the United States have paid for the purchase of North & Co. $42,000, in addition to an annual rent of $1000, which they were to have paid to Lee: and that for the release from paying this annual rent, and the privilege of digging ore in a described 1600 acres of land, and the accommodation of one-half acre of land to build on for workmen, they have paid $24,000 to General Lee.

Upon searching the records of the general court's office, at Richmond, it appears by a certificate of the clerk, that 3000 acres of land, including Friend's ore bank, was mortgaged June, 1794, to secure the payment of $8000, by several instalments, the last of which ought to have been paid on the 1st day of May, 1798. This mortgage deed is not among the papers. It is said this money has not been paid; if so, and there is no reservation in the deed of this ore bank, the United States title is incumbered to the amount of the whole mortgage money which is now due.

It is said that the title is further incumbered by a mortgage to one Wilson, of Alexandria, on which some considerable part of the money has been paid. Nothing, however, of this appears from the papers you put into my hands. I have no information respecting this purchase, excepting what has appeared on the face of the documents.

I am, sir, with esteem, your humble servant,

LEVI LINCOLN.

HENRY DEARBORN, Esq. Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 5, 1801.

SIR:

I take the liberty of suggesting, for your consideration, the propriety of proposing to Congress that provision be made for designating the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British possessions, in such manner as may prevent any disputes in future from the outlet of Lake Ontario to Lake Superior, if not further. There are many valuable islands in the lakes and rivers, some of which are already inhabited, which are claimed on each side; it is to be presumed that the sooner the line is ascertained, the more easily all disputes will be settled.

From Mr. Tracey's report, and from information obtained from other sources, it appears that many disputes now exist respecting titles to lands at and about Detroit, as well between the United States and individuals, as between many of the citizens; and also between citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain. Will it not be necessary for Congress to authorize the appointment of some board or tribunal for hearing and deciding these disputes?

H. DEARBORN.

MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 5, 1803.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Agreeably to the request of the House of Representatives, I now transmit a statement of the militia of those States from which any returns have been made to the War Office; they are, as you will perceive, but a small proportion of the whole. I send you also the copy of a circular letter, written some time since, for the purpose of obtaining returns from all the States; should any others, in consequence of this, be made during the session of Congress, they shall be immediately communicated.

TH. JEFFERSON.

[CIRCULAR.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ———.

SIR:

I have the honor, by direction of the President of the United States, to call your Excellency's attention to the 10th section of the act of Congress of the 8th of May, 1792, which provides that a return shall annually be made to the President, stating the military strength of each State, the actual situation of the arms, accoutrements, and ammunition of the several corps, within the same, and every other thing which may relate to their government, and the general advantage of good order and military discipline.

It would be very desirable, as it is highly important, to receive the information contemplated by the act alluded to. I therefore take the liberty of suggesting to your Excellency, the propriety of giving the necessary directions for carrying the said law into effect; and for the purpose of introducing and preserving uniformity in the returns, a form is herewith enclosed.

With high consideration, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

His Excellency ———.

COMPLAINT AGAINST CERTAIN OFFICERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 31, 1803.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 29, 1803.

SIR:

In obedience to the resolution of Congress of the 25th instant, the Secretary of War has made such inquiries, relative to the object* of the resolution, as present circumstances would admit of, and respectfully reports, that no information has been lodged in this office, nor any procured relating thereto, excepting, that a military post, consisting of one company, has been established on the Mobile, and continued about three years, no complaints have come to the knowledge of the Secretary of War, excepting those communicated in that clause of the resolution, on which the report is requested from this department—the military post is between the junction of the Tombigbee and the Alabama rivers, and the boundary line between the United States and West Florida, and as near the said line as a suitable site could be found.

General Wilkinson having been, for a considerable time, in the course of the last autumn, on the river Tombigbee, in the vicinity of the post, it may be presumed that the citizens in that quarter had an opportunity of giving him information relative to any improper conduct of the troops; but as information has been received at this office on the subject, it is probable that no complaint was made to the General, or, if made, that he had taken such measures as, in his opinion, would remedy the evil complained of.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

* This was an application to Congress, from the inhabitants of Washington county, in the Missisippi Territory, for the removal of two garrisons, on account of alleged misconduct of the officers.

[2d SESSION.

MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 7, 1803.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message of the 15th day of December last, which relates to the Militia institution of the United States, and a bill which was reported to the House at the last session of Congress, on the same subject, made the following report:

That, after a full investigation of the subject, they are of opinion, that a law which passed the eighth day of May, 1792, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," embraceth all the objects of a militia institution, delegated to Congress. The principles of that law lay the foundation of a militia system, on the broad basis prescribed by the constitution, and are well calculated to ensure a complete national defence, if carried into effect by the State Governments, agreeably to the power reserved to the States respectively, by the constitution, and therefore ought not to be altered. But, although the committee are of opinion that the principles of the system established on the part of the United States ought to be adhered to, yet they believe that some small alterations in the details of these principles would render that system still more efficacious, and have reported a bill for that purpose.

In those States which have taken energetic measures for carrying into effect the system adopted by Congress, agreeably to the power constitutionally vested in them, the militia are making great proficiency in military discipline, and in the knowledge of tactics, which evinceth, that the deficiency in organization, arming, and discipline of the militia, which is too apparent in some of the States, does not arise from any defect in that part of the system which is under the control of Congress, but from omission on the part of the State Governments.

In order, therefore, to impress the State Governments with the importance of the subject, and the indispensable necessity of their vigorous co-operation with the General Government, to complete the militia institution, so as to ensure, from that source, a permanent national defence, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to write to the Executive of each State, urging the importance and indispensable necessity of vigorous exertions, on the part of the State Governments, to carry into effect the militia system adopted by the national Legislature, agreeably to the powers reserved to the States respectively, by the constitution of the United States, and in a manner the best calculated to ensure such a degree of military discipline and knowledge of tactics, as will, under the auspices of a benign providence, render the militia a sure and permanent bulwark of national defence.

RATIONS COMMUTED.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 16, 1805.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 15th, 1805.

SIR:

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 14th instant, I have examined the petition of sundry officers of the army of the United States on the subject of rations; and I beg leave to submit the following observations by way of report thereon.

The principle, as stated in the petition, has long been established, that the officers should receive, in lieu of their rations, when not drawn in kind, the contract price at the posts where they may respectively be stationed, upon the presumption that the price of rations would generally be in proportion to the expense of the necessaries of life at the respective posts. There may, however, be, and probably are, exceptions to the general principle: and as some inconveniences occur in settling the accounts of officers' subsistence, in consequence of their frequent removals from one post to another, it may not be improper to establish by law what sum of money each grade shall receive in lieu of rations. And as the prices of the necessaries and conveniences of life have considerably increased, since the establishment of the present pay and emoluments of the officers of the army, and although the average contract price for the two last years has not been more than fourteen and a half cents per ration. I take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of establishing the subsistence of the officers at the rate of twenty cents for each ration allowed to the respective grades; or of allowing to each subaltern, for his subsistence, in addition to his pay, twelve dollars per month; to each captain, eighteen dollars per month; and in like proportion to all other grades of commissioned officers, including surgeons and surgeons' mates.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

To the Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

[2d SESSION.]

DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS JUSTIFIED ON THE GROUND OF ILLEGALITY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 30, 1805.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. The remonstrance and petition of sundry citizens and officers of the militia in the State of Tennessee.

Your remonstrants, having those respectful feelings for your honorable body, which citizens ought to possess, and which those bearing commissions in the militia ought ever to cherish, beg leave to represent—

That they have, with much concern, seen a veteran and meritorious officer in the army of the United States arrested for imaginary crimes, compelled to travel a distance of fifteen hundred miles to stand his trial, and that trial then postponed for several months, contrary not only to the rules and articles of war, but also to those natural rules of justice, to the benefit of which every member of society is entitled.

That the only crime of which he was found guilty, and the only one perhaps of which any serious expectation of convicting him was ever entertained, was a refusal to crop his hair, in conformity to an order which he conceived to be illegal, and which your remonstrants conceive to have been an arbitrary and useless exertion of authority; that, in the execution of the sentence of the court martial, which subjected him to a reprimand from the commanding General, your remonstrants have been able to discover, not the calmness and dignity to be expected from a person invested with so high an office, but a disposition to passion and invective, well calculated to make impressions unfavorable to the military character of the accused, and foreboding a renewal of persecution.

Your remonstrants have been prompted to an expression of these feelings, not only from a disposition to resist oppression from whatsoever quarter it may come, even if directed against the most humble and obscure member of the community, but also from a long acquaintance with the person injured in this instance, a knowledge of his virtue and integrity as a man, and his bravery and fidelity as a soldier. During a command of several years at a post where not only the greatest firmness and the strictest attention to discipline were necessary, but also the discharge of his duty in enforcing obedience to the laws had an almost unavoidable tendency to create numerous and implacable enemies; in this situation, the true state of which was but little known beyond the bounds of this State, we have seen him not only cause the laws to be respected and obeyed, but also, by the humanity and delicacy of his conduct, conciliate the esteem of the offenders, and cause those to refrain through affection, whom fear alone had been found insufficient to restrain. In other situations also, in all of which no glory or reputation in the view of the world could be acquired, and where no reward awaited him beyond the approbation of his own conscience, we have ever seen him patient, persevering, industrious, and obedient to all orders, which were in any way directed to the promotion of the public good. In fine, we declare that in the whole of his official conduct, which has fallen under our inspection, we have seen much commanding our approbation, and deserving our imitation, but nothing which, in our opinion, even malice itself could censure.

Your remonstrants further beg leave to call to the recollection of your honorable body, that the accused, Colonel Butler, entered into the service of his country early in the revolutionary war, during the whole of which depressing and perilous period he stood the firm and active officer—after its close, his desire to serve his country continued. The defeat at the site of Fort Recovery, which witnessed the death of General Butler, left his brother among the wounded. Search the history of the American army, you will often find the name of Butler; but where was it marked with disgrace? Was he ever accused of disobedience? Never, until the case occurred to which we now call your attention. When roused by the signal of danger, he was first at his post, and the first to refuse submission to indignity. The pride of a veteran of twenty-six years' service was roused by the order for cropping his venerable grey hairs, an order un sanctioned either by law, reason, or the usages of the army.

Your remonstrants further represent, that, possessing the principles of freemen, they shudder at the idea of being compelled to obey an illegal and arbitrary mandate—that, possessing the feelings of men, they can never passively stoop to such degradation. While the delegated powers of the Union are generally circumscribed by barriers, which they must not overleap, how long must it be regretted, that our fellow-citizens of the army are subject to an authority absolute and arbitrary. How much is it to be feared, that the uncontrolled power of a commander of your army shall, by the force of a general order, drive from your service the most experienced and most useful officers; oppress the bravest and most virtuous men; pursue with unrelenting persecution, under pretexts the most frivolous, those who have fought your battles, and spilled their blood in your defence; and finally degrade the military chaacter of your army, by illegal and unnecessary orders, unmerited censures, malicious arrests, and reprimands, cruel if not ridiculous.

Your remonstrants are well aware of the necessity of discipline and subordination in an army; but they cannot conceive it the duty of a freeman to obey an order un sanctioned by law, without meaning, without utility, capricious and absurd, irrelevant to the duties of a soldier, degrading to a man, and destructive of that pride which constitutes the soul of an army.

If this despotic abuse of power is tolerated, when shall it cease? Shall your militia, when called out in defence of their country, partake of the humiliation? Shall they be compelled to sustain a mutilation to humour the caprice of an individual? Must they submit to a mark to render them unlike their fellow citizens? They hope not; and that when their country requires the calling out a military force from the body of its citizens, it will not be shackled with such humiliating conditions as to render it ineffectual.

Under the impressions excited by the transaction which has called forth an expression of these sentiments, your petitioners hope, with due submission and respect, that your honorable body will ordain and establish such articles and rules for the future regulation of the army, as will prevent abuses of power, and preserve from indignity and insult those who devote their lives to the service of their country.

Your remonstrants beg leave further to represent, that Colonel Thomas Butler, of the United States Army, is the character that has been thus illegally and improperly dealt with, and in consequence thereof, the feelings of your remonstrants have been raised to make that representation of facts which they have now done; and they also beg leave to represent, that the order alluded to in this remonstrance, is radically illegal and despotic, that the cause which gave to it birth is trifling, and unworthy the attention of a great General belonging to the United States Army, and, therefore, as republicans, we feel ourselves justified and emboldened in bringing to the view of your honorable body his particular situation.

We, your remonstrants, further and lastly beg leave to make known to your honorable body, the second arrest of Colonel Thomas Butler, of the United States Army, for the simple crime of not cropping his hair, during his late command at New Orleans; and hope your honorable body will not only render such general relief as the nature of our Government requires, in its present peculiar state of good order and tranquillity, but that you will specifically relieve this worthy, aged, and respectable officer, Colonel Butler, from persecution.

8th CONGRESS.]

No. 56.

[2d SESSION.]

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 23, 1805.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress a statement of the Militia of the United States, according to the returns last received from the several States. It will be perceived that some of these are not of recent dates, and that, from the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Tennessee, no returns are stated. As far as appears from our records, none were ever rendered from either of these States.

February 28, 1805.

TH: JEFFERSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 23, 1805.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 2, 1806.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States, of the 3d of December, as relates to the organization and classification of the militia, and to the augmentation of the land forces, made the following report, in part:

In relation to a classification and new organization of the militia. The most extensive view of this part of the subject which has occurred to the committee is, a division of the militia into four classes, in the following manner, viz. those between eighteen and twenty-one years of age to compose one class; those between twenty-one and twenty-six to compose a second class; those between twenty-six and thirty-five to compose a third class; and those between thirty-five and forty-five to compose the fourth class; each class to be under a separate organization, and to be commanded by separate corps of officers. To this kind of organization, as it relates to the first class, we are met by a constitutional objection. By the Constitution of the United States, Congress are empowered "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers."

By some of the State constitutions it is provided, that the captains and subalterns of the militia shall be chosen by such of the persons who compose the respective companies as are upwards of twenty-one years of age, so that there is no constitutional provision by which such States can appoint officers to command a class of the militia composed of minors.

Knowledge of tactics, and an acquaintance with subordination and discipline, are acquirements of such importance to our national defence, that the promotion of them among the militia ought to be a primary object with the Government, and, no doubt, is exceedingly desirable in the minds of the individual citizens. But such means ought to be adopted by the Government as are best calculated to effect the object, with as little fatigue and expense to individuals as the nature of the case will admit. It is conceived, that the fatigue and expense of military discipline is, in a very great degree, proportionate to the population of the different parts of the country where the duty is performed, or, in other words, it is proportionate to the distance each individual composing the different corps is compelled to travel to reach his place of parade. Under the present organization of the militia, this idea is fully verified—the difference in the expense of militia meetings, in those parts of the country where the inhabitants are the most dispersed, when compared with similar meetings, in the more populous parts, is very apparent; and, besides, the nature of the case compels us to believe, that the same cause will produce a similar disparity in military acquirement.

These, however, are evils which grow out of the nature of the case, and cannot be remedied, but by the increase of population, because the principles of the organization are calculated to render the formation of the different corps as compact as is consistent with proper military arrangements.

By the organization and classification of the militia, in the manner which has been named, the limits of each corps must be extended over four times the quantity of territory it now occupies, and, consequently, would burthen the citizens with a proportionate additional expense in the acquisition of a competent portion of military information, or operate as a proportionate preventive to such acquisition. The subject has been viewed in another point of light, that is, to call on the two senior classes to exercise but once in a year, so as to proportion the quantum of exercise to the extension of the corps. In this case, all the evils attendant on the extension of the different corps over additional territory will attach to the junior classes which could attach to them in the other case, and the consequent hazard of a failure in discipline will remain.

Military knowledge, like that of every other science, without practice, is soon forgotten, and, although it is not probable that the whole of the militia will be needed in the field at any one time, yet, in case of invasion, it is very possible that all who are in the vicinity of the assailants may be necessary, and, as it is uncertain at what point an enemy may make his attack, all should be prepared to meet such an event; but, from a deficiency in discipline, or the want of a competent knowledge in tactics, in the two senior classes only, an important opportunity for a speedy extermination of an enemy might be lost, and the lives of many valuable citizens put in jeopardy. It is, therefore, believed, that this experiment is inadmissible.

Another view of this subject has suggested a classification of the militia by ages, under the existing organization, for the sole purpose of designating those persons who are under twenty-six years of age as the only proper objects of militia duty in the field, except in cases of great emergency, and in their particular vicinage. From eighteen to twenty-one years of age is a period of life in which the young men of the United States are employed in completing an education, in pursuit of mechanical information, or in acquiring a necessary acquaintance with some other branch of business, occupation, or profession, on the improvement of which they calculate to obtain a subsistence. From twenty-one to twenty-six, they are improving their previous acquirements in their various occupations and professions, and thereby laying a foundation for a decent support of themselves and families through life: this is a period, also, at which the young men of the United States generally engage in matrimony, and become chargeable with families, all which renders their time as dear to them, from eighteen to twenty-six years of age, as at any other period of life.

It would seem, therefore, that an arrangement which would compel this class of our citizens to bear the principal part of the burthen of national defence might justly be deemed a departure from that principle of distributive justice which ought to be a paramount characteristic of the Government of the United States.

That young men would better endure the fatigues of a long campaign than those more advanced in life is not doubted; but whether, on a sudden emergency, they would be more useful in repulsing an enemy than an equal number of enrolled militia, on an average from eighteen to forty-five, is a question of doubt; if, however, it should be considered that the advantage is in favor of the young men, it is confidently believed, that the advantage in that case to the public would not be of a sufficient magnitude to justify the Government in imposing on them such an unequal burthen.

If the proposed system should be adopted; the total derangement of the existing organization of the militia must be the consequence. It may be proper here again to remark, that, by the Constitution of the United States is vested in the General Government the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States;" but the same article of the constitution is express in "reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." By this arrangement in the constitution, the powers necessary to produce an efficient militia are divided between the General Government and the State governments. In pursuance of the power vested in the General Government on this subject, Congress did, in the year 1793, pass an act to establish a uniform militia throughout the United States, which act seems to embrace all the principles in the case delegated to Congress. Soon after the passage of that law by Congress, a consideration of the subject was assumed by the Legislatures of all the States, and laws have been passed by all the States for carrying that system into effect, so that, by the co-operation of the General Government and the State governments, the militia are now completely organized and officered throughout the Union. It is now thirteen years since this system has been in operation; the people practising under it have, in a great degree, become acquainted with it, and attached to it; and, in many parts of the Union, military discipline is rapidly progressing under it, and it cannot with propriety be doubted, that the militia of the United States, under the existing organization, are amply competent to a defence against the intrusion of any invading enemy. To derange this system, then, and introduce one totally new and untried, one in which it is not certain that the State Legislatures will concur, and which is of doubtful aspect as it relates to the approbation of the body of the People, would, in the opinion of the committee, at this important crisis of our national affairs, be putting too much at risk.

They therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to adopt measures for the classification or new organization of the militia.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 28, 1806.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the merchants of New York, submitted a report on that part of the same which relates to "the defenceless situation of the port of New York."

Early in the history of North America, the harbor of New York was discovered by the Dutch to be a convenient place of resort for ships. Subsequent experience has proved the judgment of the Hollanders to have been good. The place where the North river forms a junction with Long Island sound is as well, if not better, adapted to navigation and trade than any which the Atlantic coast affords.

The city, at the head of the harbor, is about twenty-seven miles from the ocean, the ebb and flow of the tide is about six feet. The saltness of the water is not much inferior to that of the neighboring sea.

The harbor is a bay or basin, surrounded chiefly by islands; though the space from the foot of the Neversunk hills, to the mouth of the river Raritan, and another space from Bergen point to Hoboken, are parts of the main land which skirt the shores between the insular positions. The land is mostly low, and is composed principally of gravel, sand, and loam, and, in certain spots, strata of solid granite appear.

The island of Sandy Hook, where the light house stands, is little more than a beach rising not far above the level of spring tides. Staten Island swells into moderate hills, and presents, especially on its eastern side, several bold elevations. Long Island, whose western extremity loses its ridges and hills in the plains of Flatlands and New-trecht, still retains at the Narrows, where its cliffs are somewhat abrupt and prominent, several positions of considerable strength. On these shores of the two last mentioned islands, the army of the enemy was lauded in 1776, and a repetition of such an invasion might be discouraged by the erection of suitable works to oppose it. Governor's Island has already been much improved by military works, and is the spot on which Fort Jay and the principal other fortifications have been erected. Bedloe Island, though very small, has also been considered proper for defensive operations, and, in some degree, prepared to annoy an enemy. On Manhattan Island, where the city of New York stands, there was once a fort and battery. These have been demolished of late years, under a conviction of their unfitness, as have likewise some more recent breastworks and parapets, which, though constructed but eight or nine years ago, were, within a twelvemonth, destroyed by the people who made them.

Between these islands there are deep channels and rapid currents. Ships of large force may be brought in from sea and anchored in safety abreast of the town. And, having once reached that station, there is water enough to convey frigates or even larger ships quite to the city of Hudson.

To the saltness, depth, and swiftness of the current, is to be ascribed the openness of the harbor of New York during the winter. In 1780, its surface was covered by a thick and strong covering of ice. The like has never happened since, not even during the rigorous winter of 1805. And it is remarkable, that, while the Delaware, Patapsco, and Potomac are frozen, and Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Alexandria are secured thereby from the fleets of an invader, the bay of New York, though situated further to the northward, possesses commonly no such protection, but is accessible from the ocean, with but trifling impediment.

The insecurity of the city is evinced by other facts. With a small squadron of ships in 1674, the English took it from the Dutch. Shortly afterwards it was retaken with almost equal ease. No cause of attack occurring until the commencement of the revolutionary war, it was found utterly incapable of defence against a hostile fleet and army in 1776, and abandoned to the enemy by the troops arrayed for its protection. And that very foe, which then gained the possession, held it as a garrison until 1783, when, on its evacuation, the inhabitants were enabled to return to their homes, after an exile of seven long years.

Since the Revolution, New York has greatly increased in population, extent, capital, and enterprise. The memorialists state that there one third of the national revenue is collected. They hope so important a sea port may be thought worthy of an efficient defence; and they beg that a portion of the public treasure accumulated in that place, may be expended in rendering both that treasure and the city in which it is kept more secure.

For the further information of the Senate, the committee beg leave to observe, that a piece of land has been already purchased by the State, on Staten Island, comprehending the high point on which the signal poles of the merchants are erected. The greater part of Governor's Island is understood to be the property of the State—a small part of it only having been purchased by the nation. On these parcels of ground the labor of constructing works is the principal matter of expense. And it is in this posture of affairs that the memorialists, after the State has done so much, ask the nation to bear a proportional part of the charge, necessary to provide more formidable means of defence and offence.

Extravagant estimates have been made by certain jobbers and projectors. Artificial islands, and immense piers, and enormous floating batteries, and vast chevaux de frises, have been talked of; enough to absorb the whole revenue, and to terrify all sober calculators of the cost. The committee have dismissed those schemes, as savouring rather of the visionary and magnificent, than of the useful and feasible. They content themselves with recommending an appropriation to a moderate amount, for making further military improvements on the sites already purchased, and which the State may hereafter purchase and surrender; in full confidence, at the same time, that a due proportion of the heavy artillery, armed ships, and gun boats of the nation, will be stationed at the harbor of New York.

Under these impressions, the following proposition is submitted:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the sum of ——— dollars, to be laid out in such manner, and under such direction, as Congress shall judge proper, in fortifying the harbor and city of New York.

The committee have deemed it to be within the limits assigned them, to recommend another proposition, in favor of the capital of South Carolina:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the sum of ——— dollars, to be laid out in such manner, and under such regulations, as Congress shall judge proper, in fortifying the port of Charleston in South Carolina.

And, for the purpose of providing for other defenceless places, if any such there be, the committee submit another proposition:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the sum of ——— dollars, to be laid out in fortifying such ports and harbors, other than New York and Charleston, as the President of the United States shall think most conducive to the public security.

Remarks in relation to New York Harbor.

In the years 1794, and 1795, considerable expenses were incurred in the harbor of New York, in fortifications on Governor's, Bedloe's, and Ellis's Islands, and in front of the city.

On Governor's Island, a regular enclosed work, with detached batteries for heavy cannon and mortars, was erected with a magazine and barracks, which require considerable repairs and improvements. On the other islands, there were batteries and magazines, with some barracks, which also require repairs.

A formidable battery of heavy cannon and mortars (which is now in ruins) was erected in front of the city. A heavy park of artillery was also mounted on travelling carriages, and placed in a building belonging to the State, within the city.

No considerable improvements have been made on the above mentioned works, or additional fortifications erected, for the defence of the harbor of New York, within the last five years; there having been no funds for those objects furnished by the State, as contemplated by the act of Congress of the 3d of May, 1798, and understood to have been intended by the State.

Engineers were employed by the Governor of the State to survey and examine the harbor, and to report the best practicable mode of defence. The report, accompanied by drawings and estimates, was transmitted to the President of the United States in the year 1801. By this project, the principal works were to be at Sandy Hook. The estimates, amounting to 3,968,658 dollars, were considered as a sufficient reason for rejecting the report; the debt of the State of New York (which was the limit of the sum authorized to be expended) being only $1,852,035. In January, 1805, a report was also received from another engineer, accompanied by a letter from the mayor of the city, in which the Narrows were contemplated as the principal place of defence. The estimates for completing the works amounted to 2,000,000 of dollars, and the plan of defence proposed inspired no confidence.

Lieutenant Colonel Williams, of the corps of engineers, was, last autumn, directed to make such a survey of the harbor of New York, as would enable him to report, with accuracy, the width of the Narrows, from the water's edge on each side; the distances from Governor's Island to Bedloe's, to Ellis's Island, and to the battery in front of the city, and from the city to the nearest point on the Jersey shore. This duty he performed, and reported, accompanying his report with a drawing of the harbor, showing the relative situation of the several points alluded to in his instructions, with remarks on the subject generally, and particularly on fortifying the Narrows.

I will here take the liberty of offering some general remarks, on the subject of defending our ports and harbors.

Notwithstanding the experience of ages to the contrary, an opinion appears to have been prevalent, and in many cases relied upon, that fixed batteries, on the margins of channels not more than one mile in width, might, under the direction of skilful officers, render the passage of ships of war so difficult and unsafe, as to prevent their attempting such passages. It is the more remarkable, that such an opinion should have continued to prevail, after so many instances have occurred of ships of war not only having passed the best batteries within even point blank shot, (which is less than 500 yards) but of their presenting their broadsides to such batteries, with springs on their cables, and sustaining the fire for a considerable length of time, and even, in many cases, of silencing the batteries.

The action, in the year 1801, between a British squadron and several strong batteries, in the harbor of Copenhagen, where, probably, there was no want of skill or bravery on the side of the Danes, (the result of which is in the recollection of every one) proves, beyond any reasonable doubt, the incorrectness of the opinion alluded to. Many other instances might be adduced, as evidence of the impropriety of relying on fixed batteries for preventing ships of war, with a fair wind and tide, passing through a channel of one mile in width, or even within point blank shot of the batteries, especially where the course is nearly direct, as is the case at the Narrows, at the entrance of New York harbor. This passage cannot be reduced to less than seven-eighths of a mile in width, and that only by erecting works on a reef 500 yards from Long Island shore, where there are three feet of water at the lowest time of tide, and nine feet at high water.

It will be recollected by many, that in the summer of 1776, a British ship, of about forty guns, had been some distance up the Hudson, above New York; that it was known she would soon pass down by that city, and the batteries were prepared at several places on the bank of the river, in and above the city, with the most sanguine expectations of destroying the ship on her passage; but, although she descended in the day time, with a moderate breeze, which afforded full time for the batteries to act on her, and a tremendous cannonade commenced from the respective batteries as she passed, no apparent injury was received by the ship; and it was generally remarked, that she appeared to be no more incommoded by the batteries than if no shot had been fired. Her distance from the batteries was about half a mile, which is little more than the distance of the centre of the channel in the Narrows from any batteries which could be erected on either or both shores.

It now remains to be decided: 1st. Whether the Narrows, or any other points, are susceptible of being so fortified as to afford a sufficient defence to the harbor and city?

2dly. Whether any other practicable system of defence may be sufficiently relied upon? and,

3dly. What general or particular system ought to be adopted?

That the harbor of New York is not susceptible of such defence as ought to be relied on by permanent or fixed batteries, must be evident to every one who will reflect upon the subject; and, consequently, that some other system ought to be adopted. This, it is presumed, should consist of at least one regular enclosed work, capable of being defended against a sudden assault, together with such fixed batteries as may most effectually annoy ships of war on their approach to the city, and while in a situation to batter it; and also of a suitable weight of moving batteries, by land and water, such as a heavy park of cannon and howitzers, mounted on travelling carriages, and placed in the city, together with a sufficient number of well constructed gun boats. Should such a system of defence not be considered as sufficient for the security of the harbor and city of New York, it will be difficult, if not impracticable, to propose any adequate to the object, short of heavy ships of war, in sufficient number to meet any force which an enemy may direct against that place.

Ocracock Harbor, North Carolina.				On an island, called Beacon Island, a work was commenced in the year 1795, but not completed; and in the year 1799 measures were directed for the erection of an enclosed work on the ruins of the former work, but from a belief that no work could be erected and supported at that place, which would afford any considerable protection to the harbor, none has been erected. It is presumed that two gun boats would more securely protect that harbor than any fixed batteries that might be erected.

On a small island called Cockspar, near the mouth of the river, irregular fortifications were erected in the year 1794, with a battery, magazine, and barracks. In the year 1804 the works and barracks were totally destroyed, and a part of the garrison drowned, by a storm which occasioned such a rise of the water as overflowed the island to a considerable depth; but as no cession has been made to the United States, by the State of Georgia, of any suitable site or sites, for permanent fortifications, and it not having been in the power of the Executive of the United States to procure any, on reasonable terms, either on the Savannah river or the St. Mary's, no considerable expense has been incurred on the sea coast of that State, for the last five years, and the garrison has been removed from the St. Mary's as well as from Fort Green.

PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 1, 1806.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1806.

SIR:

The Secretary of War, to whom the petition of sundry officers of the army, serving in the territory of Louisiana, has been referred, by an order of the House of Representatives of the United States, of the 25th instant, begs leave to remark thereon:

That he feels a delicacy in offering any opinion on the competency of the present pay of the army.

Whether the facts stated in the said petition, as to the relative value of money, or the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life, between the year 1792 and the present time, are correct or not, it is presumed that it will not be necessary for the Secretary to give an opinion.

If, under existing circumstances, it should not be thought advisable to increase the monthly pay of the officers of the army, there may be a propriety in establishing an uniformity in the price or value of the ration allowed to the officers, at a rate at least equal to the highest price at present given for the supply of our troops, which is eighteen cents per ration; and Congress will consider whether the present necessary expenses of living will not render it advisable and just to increase the value of the officer's ration to twenty cents. An established uniformity in the value of their rations would prevent many inconveniences in the settlement of their accounts for pay and subsistence, as it is not uncommon for an officer to be at several posts in the course of a few months, at no two of which the price of the ration is the same.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial of the subscribers, officers of the army, serving in Louisiana, humbly sheweth:

That the pay of the officers of the army hath not been augmented or increased since the 5th of March, 1792, at which time the necessaries of life, generally, could be purchased in any part of the United States for about one half of their present prices; that, in the territories of Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, and Orleans, the present price of almost every article necessary for their use, is threefold what it could be purchased for in the United States in 1792; and that, in this territory in particular, prices are much more exorbitant: as evidence of this fact your memorialists beg leave to state, that the common price of brown sugar is fifty cents, and of coffee from seventy-five to a hundred cents per pound, in the town of St. Louis, and that groceries and merchandise of every kind are proportionably high throughout the territory.

If it be true, as your memorialists believe it is, that the pay of the army, as established in 1792, was but a moderate and reasonable compensation, and so considered by the Government and people of the United States, and if that compensation has depreciated to less than half its original value, is it not reasonable and just that it should be so increased, as that each individual may receive for his services a sum equal in value to that originally intended for him, and established by law? Your memorialists presume it is; and relying on the principles of fair contract, and the justice of their country, for which all their blood is ready to flow, they respectfully approach your honorable body, and beg leave to submit their case to your consideration, in full confidence that you will grant such relief as may be deemed reasonable and just.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 2, 1806.

MR. VARNUM, from the committee instructed to inquire what measures are necessary to be adopted to complete the arming the militia of the United States, made the following report:

That, by the laws of the United States, each citizen enrolled in the militia is put under obligations to provide himself with a good musket or rifle, and all the other military equipments prescribed by law. From the best estimate which the committee have been able to form, there is upwards of 250,000 fire arms and rifles in the hands of the militia, which have, a few instances excepted, been provided by, and are the property of, the individuals who hold them. It is highly probable, that many more of the militia would have provided themselves with fire arms in the same way, if they had been for sale in those parts of the United States where the deficiencies have happened; but the wars in Europe have had a tendency to prevent the importation of fire arms from thence into the United States, which, together with the limited establishments for the manufacture of that implement in the United States, has rendered it impossible for individuals to procure them.

There are several State magazines of fire arms, but the amount of the number of stands has not been ascertained. There are in the magazines of the United States about 120,000 fire arms and rifles fit for use, and about 12,000 which need repairs. It is conceived that the number of fire arms in the public magazines is not greater than ought to remain there in time of peace.

And the committee are of opinion that, to provide for the exigency of war, it will be expedient to extend the manufacture of fire arms, in the armories of the United States, as far as can conveniently be done, without the erection of new buildings; to effect which, it will be necessary to appropriate, for that purpose, $62,100 in addition to the sums reported in the general estimate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 7th, 1806.

SIR:

In answer to the queries contained in your letter of the 1st inst. I beg leave, through you, to submit the following statements and remarks to the consideration of the committee instructed to inquire "what measures are necessary to be adopted to complete the arming of the militia of the United States."

In the years 1802, 1803, 1804, and 1805, there have been manufactured 16,234 muskets with bayonets, at the armory in Springfield, Massachusetts.

The expense of this armory within the same time, exclusive of the expenditures incurred in consequence of the burning of one of the buildings attached to the establishment, has amounted to 145,214 dollars. The average expense, therefore, of each musket, within the aforesaid four years, is eight dollars ninety-four and a half cents.

In the armory at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, there have, within the same years, been manufactured, of muskets with bayonets,

Of rifles, 2,488, equal to muskets,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2,676
Old arms repaired, estimated equal to the manufactory of muskets,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	750
Total,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	7,158

The expenses of the armory, within the same time, exclusive of repairs of dam and canal, amount to 96,169 dollars.

The average expense of each musket, within the aforesaid term of four years, manufactured at this armory, appears consequently to be thirteen dollars forty-three and a half cents.

A defect in the dam and canal occasioning, in the year 1802, a want of water for the use of the machinery, and the prevalence of a bilious complaint among the workmen, in a subsequent year, considerably retarded, in those two years, the operation of the armory at Harper's Ferry. It will not be improper, moreover, to remark, that the muskets and rifles manufactured at this armory are superior in workmanship to any others intended for military purposes, which are manufactured either in this, or, I presume, in any other country.

Although the muskets manufactured at the Springfield armory are not as highly finished as those made at Harper's Ferry, they are still considered equal, if not superior, in workmanship, to the best muskets, manufactured for the use of soldiers, in either France or England.

To what extent the existing public armories may be increased in number of workmen, and how far the number of arms manufactured annually may be augmented, without increasing the average expense of the arms, it is difficult to determine. It is probable, however, that such an additional number of workmen may be employed, as would ensure the manufacturing of from ten to eleven thousand muskets annually, with but a small, if any, additional average expense on each musket.

The existing armories might be so extended, by additional buildings and apparatus, as to admit of a much greater number of workmen, and, of course, of the manufacturing of a proportional increase in the number of arms annually. But, for such an additional number of workmen, as is first above contemplated, it is presumed that no considerable augmentation of expense would be required for buildings or apparatus.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 11, 1806.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the returns last received from the several States and territories. It will be perceived that some of these are not of recent dates; and that, from the States of Maryland and Delaware, no returns are stated. As far as appears from our records, none were ever rendered from either of these States. From the territories of Orleans, Louisiana, and Michigan, complete returns have not yet been received.

* Governor Wilkinson reports the number of men liable to militia duty in the Territory of Louisiana, on the 30th January, 1806, to amount to 2,220.

By direction of the President of the United States, letters were written by the Secretary of War to the Governors of each State, on the 8th day of December, 1802, requesting their attention to the tenth section of the law of Congress, respecting annual returns of the militia being made to the President of the United States, passed on the 8th day of May, 1792, and on the 8th day of November, 1805; letters were written to the Governors of the several States and territories, requesting them to give directions for making a return of the militia to the Department of War, by the 1st day of January, 1806, if practicable, but if not, as soon thereafter as possible. An expectation of receiving returns from the States and territories, generally, in consequence of this request, has caused a delay in compiling this return; still, however, it will be perceived that, from some, no returns have been received, and from others none have been made since 1802 and 1803.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1806.

No. 64.

[2d SESSION.]

FORTIFICATIONS AND GUNBOATS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DEC. 15, 1806.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed on the 5th inst. to take into consideration that part of the message of the President of the United States, of December 2d, 1806, which relates to the protection of the seaports, harbors, and waters of the United States, made a report, as follows:

It appears from the communication of the Secretary of War, made to Congress on the 18th February, 1806,* that several of the public works erected in different parts of the nation, for the purposes of defence, stood in need of finishing, or repairs. The condition of the fortifications at Fort Sumner, in Maine; Fort Constitution, in New Hampshire; Fort Independence, in Massachusetts; Forts Adams and Wolcott, in Rhode Island; Fort Trumbull, in Connecticut; Fort Jay, in New York; Fort Mifflin, in Pennsylvania; Fort McHenry, in Maryland; Fort Nelson, in Virginia; Fort Johnston, in North Carolina; Forts Moultrie, Pinckney, and Johnston, in South Carolina; Fort Green, in Georgia; and of Forts St. Louis, St. Charles, and St. Philip, in Orleans; and of the various other forts and military stations, is well known to the War Department, and only requires appropriations of money, from year to year, to enable the needful additions to be made.

It is, therefore, deemed unnecessary to enter into a detailed enumeration of their respective wants; but the committee cannot forbear to make mention of New York, Charleston, and New Orleans.

They are fully sensible of the great and growing importance of New York; its exposed situation is a subject of public and general concern. It is agreed that the national power ought to be employed in its protection. The attention of the Executive was, therefore, turned to that object during the summer and autumn of 1806, and upwards of $25,000 were expended in repairing and enlarging, in the most substantial manner, the works on Governor's Island. These are progressing with all convenient speed; and, though at this moment suspended, on account of the rigor of the season, the committee has had the satisfaction to learn that the labor will be resumed with the cessation of the cold, and be steadily continued until both the city and harbor shall be put into a respectable state of defence. By the fortifications which it is intended to construct, upon the different favorable positions which the land affords, both above and below Governor's Island, skilful engineers conceive that so much will be done as to repel every ordinary assault of ships, and of all other force less than an invading army. The intended substitution of permanent structures of solid masonry, instead of wood and sand, will indeed require more time for their completion; but an ample compensation for this will be found eventually in their greater strength and durability.

The fortifications at Charleston, South Carolina, having been almost totally ruined by the severe hurricane of 1804, measures have been already adopted to rebuild them in the best manner that the situation of the ground admits.

Preparations are also making for the protection of New Orleans, and the mouth of the Mississippi, and evince a similar attention to the public interests in that quarter.

The committee, however, has not judged it necessary to particularize the specific sums which it may be needful to apply to each of these important objects. There would be considerable difficulty in this, for want of circumstantial and minute information. They, therefore, believe it will be sufficient to recommend an ample appropriation in gross, for the repair of existing fortifications, and the erection of such new ones as may be required; and to leave the expenditure of the same, where the general safety or local welfare shall demand it, to the ample information and sound discretion of the Executive.

Under these considerations the committee ask leave to report a bill making further appropriations for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States and for building gun boats.

[2d SESSION.]

DEFENCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI AGAINST SPANISH INVASION.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 18, 1806.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the invasion of our territory by the troops of Spain, and to the adoption of measures for the protection thereof, respectfully recommend the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to fortify and defend such position on the Mississippi, below the city of New Orleans, as the President of the United States shall designate, for the protection of that city; and that further provision ought to be made by law for guarding the approaches to the same from the east.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to accept of any company or companies of volunteers, either of artillery, cavalry, or infantry, who may associate and offer themselves for the service, (not exceeding ——— thousand men) who shall be clothed and furnished with horses, at their own expense, and armed and otherwise equipped at the expense of the United States, except such of them as may choose to furnish their own arms, and whose commissioned officers shall be appointed by the respective state and territorial authorities; who shall be liable to be called upon to do military duty, at any time the President shall judge proper, within ——— after he shall accept the same; and when called into actual service, and whilst remaining in the same, shall be under the same rules and regulations, and be entitled to the same pay, rations, forage, and allowance for clothing, with the regular troops of the United States.

COMMITTEE ROOM, December 10, 1806.

SIR:

The committee appointed in pursuance of the enclosed resolution have instructed me to request that you will lay before them such information, touching the subject, as may be in possession of your Department.

The committee are desirous to be informed, What is the present state of the American and Spanish forces in the territory of Orleans and the adjacent provinces of Spain. To what extent the strength of the last may probably be increased; and the means on which Government relies for the protection of its citizens on that frontier.

I am, very respectfully, sir, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1806.

SIR:

Agreeably to the request of the committee, as expressed in your letter of the 10th instant, I herewith enclose such information on the subject referred to them, as is possessed by this Department, in addition to what was communicated to Congress, with the message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, viz:

A copy of Governor Cordero's answer to General Wilkinson's letter, of the 4th of October, marked No. 1, and an extract from Captain General Salcedo's answer to Governor Claiborne's first letter to Governor Herrera, marked No. 2.

To which I would beg leave to add the following statement and remarks:

The law fixing the military establishment of the United States being under the eye of the committee, it may only be necessary to remark that, of the force which it authorizes, eighteen companies are posted as follows, viz:

1 Company in Portland and Portsmouth harbors,	1 Company on frontiers of Tennessee,
1 ditto in Boston harbor and at the arsenal, Springfield,	1 ditto at Chickasaw Bluffs and Arkansas,
1 ditto in Rhode Island and Connecticut,	1 ditto at Massac and Vincennes,
1 ditto in New York harbor,	1 ditto at St. Louis,
1 ditto on the Delaware, below Philadelphia,	1 ditto at Chicago, south end of Lake Michigan,
1 ditto in Norfolk and Baltimore harbors,	1 ditto at Detroit,
1 ditto in Charleston harbor, South Carolina, and in North Carolina,	1 ditto at Michillimackinack,
2 ditto on frontiers of Georgia,	1 ditto at Niagara,
	1 ditto at Fort Wayne, on the portage between the Wabash and the Miami of the Lakes.

The remaining force is under the immediate command of the General in the Orleans and Mississippi territories. The corps are nearly complete, including the recruits now on their passage for the Lower Mississippi.

In addition to the regular force, under the immediate command of the General, he is authorized to call on the Orleans and Mississippi territories for such reinforcements of militia as may be thought expedient.

Arms for infantry, and pistols and swords for a due proportion of cavalry, have been forwarded to New Orleans, for the use of such militia as might be called into service.

The Spanish force, which has lately crossed and recrossed the Sabine, has been represented as amounting to one thousand five hundred men, principally mounted militia; there is, however, reason for believing that their numbers have been over-rated. Their force at Pensacola, Mobile, and Baton Rouge, amounts, probably, to from five hundred to six hundred and fifty men.

It is not possible to form any thing like a correct opinion of the force which Spain could bring into the field from her extensive western and southern territories, or from beyond sea. It may be presumed, that the war in which she is at present engaged, and which endangers some of her valuable possessions, must render it difficult for her to draw a very considerable force to any point on our frontiers.

As to the protection of our citizens, I may be allowed to refer the committee to the message of the President of the United States to Congress, of the second instant; in which he has expressed his ideas of the means of protecting them, at the commencement of a war, and until a regular army may be raised. But as the right of deciding on this, as well as other questions, rests with Congress, the President must rely on the means they shall judge it most expedient to provide.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. JOHN RANDOLPH, Chairman, &c.

CAMP OF NACOGDOCHES, October 11, 1806.

SIR:

I informed your Excellency, by my letter of the 29th of last month, that I had sent that of your Excellency, of the 24th of the same month, to the Captain General Brigadier Don Nemesio Salcedo, on whom I depend, because I was not invested with a competent authority for its discussion, and as the answer belonged to said chief. I flatter myself that, in consideration of the good of humanity, which your Excellency professed to wish, and of the good harmony which reigns between our Governments, your Excellency would have expressed his answer to determine on your operations, because I am not at liberty not to carry into execution the orders which command me to consider the Hondo run as the boundary line of the province.

I see, by the letter of your Excellency, of the 4th instant, which I have just received, that, against my hopes, you have marched your troops towards the Sabine; without any hostile views against the Spaniards, but with the intention only of maintaining the pretensions of the United States to that side of said river.

Your Excellency is very well acquainted with the sacred duties of a soldier: I must, in consequence, declare to your Excellency, that, though the result of the operations which your Excellency has undertaken, ought not, in any manner whatever, to be considered as an act of hostility provoked by my Government, I must oppose myself to it, in discharge of the obligation which I am under, to oppose myself to the aggressions of the United States, and to preserve entire, as far as lies in my power, the dominions of my sovereign.

I take the proper means that your Excellency may receive this letter, praying the Lord our God that he may preserve your life for many years.

I am, respectfully, &c.

ANTONIO CORDERO.

His Excellency General JAMES WILKINSON.

Extract of a letter from the Captain General Don Nemesio Salcedo to Governor Claiborne, dated CHIHUAGUA, September 18, 1806.

By my orders, I am bound to maintain the best harmony with the Government of the United States; and to that end, I have directed all my views, as your Excellency may be convinced by the conduct which has been followed, and by the letter which, under my directions, the Governor of Texas wrote on the 7th of March last, to the commandant of the fort of Natchitoches, exhorting him not to repeat, on either side, any acts of hostility concerning the disputed territory. Of this letter, Major Porter acknowledged receipt, and gave assurances that he was on the point of sending an account of it to General Wilkinson, to whom he left the decision; which, however, has not as yet been verified.

After this intelligence, your Excellency will find no just motive to draw the sword on account of the movements of the troops on this frontier; especially after being assured, that neither those troops nor their chiefs have had, or at present have, any orders to make new establishments. Your Excellency may be assured, that all my actions are directed in compliance with my duties, and with a view that I may, at no period whatever, be reproached with having suffered, in any manner, the usurpation of the smallest part of the dominions of my king under my charge. But in consideration of the assurance which your Excellency gives, that the subject is now in treaty between the two Governments, and the frankness with which you state the disputed claim as one that shall be amicably adjusted, without availing ourselves of our rights, the operations of our troops shall be limited (under the responsibility of your Excellency) to patrolling the disputed lands, to see and prevent any settlement from being made by citizens of either nation.

Your Excellency knows very well, that, whilst this is the most moderate behavior I can adopt, I must also repel all aggressions of the American Government, and act conformably to the strictest accomplishment of the first obligation of my station.

FORTIFICATIONS AND GUNBOATS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 12, 1807.

Mr. ROGER NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the third ultimo, so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the repairs of fortifications and to the further protection of our ports, towns, and rivers, reported that they have taken the same into consideration, and beg leave to recommend the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a sum of money, not exceeding ——— dollars, be appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to cause our fortifications to be improved and repaired.

Resolved, That a further sum of money, not exceeding ——— dollars, be appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to cause to be built a number of gunboats, not exceeding ———, for the better protection of our ports, towns, and rivers.*

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 9, 1806.

SIR:

In answer to your letter of the third instant, permit me to refer the committee, of which you are chairman, to the report of the Secretary of War, of the 13th of February last, on the subject of fortifications; and to add thereto, the following remarks, relative to the repairs, additional works, and expenditures, which have since been made:

At Portsmouth, New Hampshire, about three thousand dollars have been expended in erecting new barracks.

At Fort Trumbull, New London, Connecticut, repairs have been made on the barracks.

On Governor's Island, in the harbor of New York, a regular work in masonry has been commenced, and is far advanced. The expenses attending it have not yet been adjusted, but probably amount to between twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars.

At Fort Nelson, Virginia, twenty heavy cannon have been mounted on travelling carriages.

At Fort Johnston, North Carolina, further progress has been made in the works.

In South Carolina, every thing remains as heretofore, owing to a disappointment in fixing the proper sites.

Although Captain Macomb, of the Corps of Engineers, in pursuance of orders from this Department, proceeded, on the 20th of June last, to Charleston, and remained there until the 11th of July, nothing on this head could be done, in consequence of his being unable to procure from the office of the Deputy Secretary of State of South Carolina, the map on which the land and sites for fortifications, ceded to the United States, were particularly delineated.

Having been ordered a second time to Charleston, it is expected that he will be able to do something on the subject this winter.

In Georgia, a new military establishment has been made, on the Oakmulgee river.

At New Orleans, we have been disappointed in having suitable sites selected for proposed works; it is presumed, however, that some progress has lately been made in fortifications at that place, which will be continued.

Of the one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, appropriated the last session of Congress, for fortifying ports and harbors, not more than forty-eight thousand have probably been expended.

Arrangements have been made for the next year, which will likely exhaust the remainder of the aforesaid appropriation, together with the sum applicable to that object, in the estimate of this Department for the ensuing year.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. ROGER NELSON.

[2d SESSION.]

DEFENCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 15, 1807.

COMMITTEE ROOM, December 31, 1806.

GENTLEMEN:

The committee to whom have been referred the enclosed resolution of the House of Representatives, have instructed me to request that you will furnish them with information on the following points, and with such other remarks as you may deem material:

1. The protection which now is, or can be, afforded to the city of New Orleans, by the existing military and naval establishments.
2. The mode in which that city may be most effectually defended.
3. The probable expense of such a system of defence.

I am, with high respect, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JOHN RANDOLPH.

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, to fortify and defend such position on the Mississippi, below the city of New Orleans, as the President of the United States shall designate, for the protection of that city; and that further provision ought to be made, by law, for guarding the approaches to the same from the east.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 9, 1801.

SIR:

In answer to your letter of the 31st ultimo, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 24th of the same month, I have the honor to remark, that, from the recent movements of the troops in Orleans territory, and its vicinity, I am unable to state, with correctness, the present strength of the regular force, now under General Wilkinson, at New Orleans, and must rely on an expression of the General, in a late communication of his to this Department, which stated the probable number at one thousand men, exclusive of the militia of Orleans, and the naval force under Captain Shaw. The number of militia is uncertain; probably not exceeding three or four hundred to be relied on.

The naval force not being under the direction of this Department, the committee will please to excuse my not being able to comply with their request in this respect. Many opinions have been received on the subject of defending the city of New Orleans and its vicinity, by fortifications; but the present prevailing opinion appears to be, that no system of fortification, within our power, at or about the city, could be of any essential use for its defence; and that an improvement of the old work at Plaquemines, an establishment of batteries at the English Turn, and a battery, with a suitable cover, at the junction of the Bayou St. John with Lake Pontchartrain, aided by a suitable number of gunboats, in the river and the lake, together with such a body of troops as circumstances may, from time to time, appear to require, must be relied on for the defence of that place.

The expense necessary to complete the works mentioned above, is the more difficult to be estimated, on account of the scarcity of suitable materials, and the uncertainty of what may be requisite to secure the foundations of the works.

From fifty to seventy thousand dollars may be sufficient; but no estimate, in my power to make, on this subject, can be depended on for its accuracy.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

[2d SESSION.]

GRATUITIES TO THE OFFICERS AND MEN IN THE EXPEDITION TO THE PACIFIC OCEAN, UNDER LEWIS AND CLARKE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 23, 1807.

COMMITTEE ROOM, January 12, 1807.

SIR:

The committee to whom has been referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, to inquire what compensation ought to be made to Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, and their brave companions, for their late service in exploring the Western waters, have instructed me to request that you will furnish them with such information, in the possession of the Department of War, as you may deem necessary to guide the committee in establishing their rate of compensation; also a list of the names of the officers, and their respective grades, and the names of the soldiers under their command.

From your most obedient servant,

WILLIS ALSTON, Jun.

SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 14, 1807.

SIR:

Agreeably to the request of the committee, as expressed in your letter of the 12th inst., I herewith transmit a list of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, who formed the party recently returned from an enterprise, which they commenced and prosecuted with a degree of boldness, perseverance, judgment, and success, that has rarely, if ever, occurred, in this or any other country.

The officers and soldiers will receive their usual compensations from this Department, up to the time of their return to St. Louis.

The quantum of gratuity, either in land or money, or in both, to which such meritorious and unusual services may be entitled, on the score of national justice, or on the principles of sound policy and national liberality, being principally a matter of opinion, it is with diffidence I take the liberty of proposing, for the consideration of the committee, a grant to each non-commissioned officer and private, of 320 acres of land; to Lieut. Clarke, of 1000; and to Captain Lewis, of 1,500; with the addition of double pay to each while engaged in the enterprise; and that each one should have permission to locate his grant on any lands that have been surveyed, and are now for sale by the United States.

It may be proper for me to remark, that, in a conversation with Captain Lewis, he observed, that whatever grant of land Congress might think proper to make to himself and Lieutenant Clarke, it was his wish there should be no distinction of rank so noticed as to make a difference in the quantity granted to each; and that he would prefer an equal division of whatever quantity might be granted to them.

I also transmit, herewith, the letter from Captain Lewis to the Secretary of War, which accompanied said list.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. WILLIS ALSTON, Chairman, &c.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, January 15, 1807.

SIR:

Herewith enclosed I transmit you the roll of the men who accompanied me on my late tour to the Pacific Ocean, through the interior of the continent of North America.

In addition to the men whose names are entered on this roll, there are two others who have some claims to a gratuity, as connected with the expedition; but as I cannot consider them, in all respects, as of the permanent party, I have thought their pretensions more properly the subjects of this detached communication, than of the roll which accompanies it.

Richard Warfington was a corporal in the infantry of the United States' army, whom I had occasion to take with me on my voyage as far as the Mandan nation. His term of service expired on the 4th of August, 1804, nearly three months previous to my arrival at that place. Knowing that it would become necessary for me to send back my boat in the spring of 1805, with a party of soldiers, whose terms of service had not expired; that it was of some importance that the Government should receive, in safety, the despatches which I was about to transmit from thence; that there was not one of the party, destined to be returned from thence, in whom I could place the least confidence, except himself; and that, if he was discharged at the moment of the expiration of his term of service, he would necessarily lose his military standing, and thereby lessen the efficiency of his command among the soldiery; I was induced, under these considerations, to make an arrangement with him, by which it was agreed between us, that he should not receive his discharge from the military service until his return to St. Louis, and that he should, in the interim, retain his rank, and receive only for his services the accustomed compensation. Accordingly, he remained with me during the winter, and was, the next spring, in conformity to my plan, placed in command of the boat, and charged with my despatches to the Government. The duties assigned him, on this occasion, were performed with a punctuality which uniformly marked his conduct while under my command. Taking into view the cheerfulness with which he continued in the service after every obligation had ceased to exist from his enlistment; the fatigues, labor, and dangers, incident to that service; and, above all, the fidelity with which he discharged his duty; it would seem, that when rewards were about to be distributed among those of the party who were engaged in this enterprise, that his claim to something more than his pay of seven dollars per month, as corporal, cannot be considered unreasonable.

John Newman was a private in the infantry of the United States' army, who joined me as a volunteer, and entered into an enlistment, in common with others, by which he was held and mustered as one of the permanent party. In the course of the expedition, or shortly before we arrived at the Mandan village, he committed himself by using certain mutinous expressions, which caused me to arrest him, and to have him tried by a court martial, formed of his peers: they, finding him guilty, sentenced him to receive seventy-five lashes, and to be discharged from the permanent party. This sentence was confirmed by me, and the punishment took place. The conduct of this man, previous to this period, had been generally correct; and the zeal he afterwards displayed for the benefit of the service, was highly meritorious. In the course of the winter, while at Fort Mandan, from an ardent wish to atone for the crime which he had committed at an unguarded moment, he exerted himself, on every occasion, to become useful. This disposition induced him to expose himself too much to the intense cold of that climate, and on a hunting excursion, he had his hands and feet severely frozen, with which he suffered extreme pain, for some weeks. Having recovered from this accident by the 1st of April, 1805, he asked forgiveness for what had passed, and begged that I would permit him to continue with me through the voyage; but deeming it impolitic to relax from the sentence, although he stood acquitted in my mind, I determined to send him back, which was accordingly done. Since my return I have been informed that he was extremely serviceable as a hunter, on the voyage to St. Louis, and that the boat, on several occasions, owed her safety, in a great measure, to his personal exertions, being a man of uncommon activity and bodily strength. If, under these circumstances, it should be thought proper to give Newman the remaining third which will be deducted from the gratuity awarded Baptiste Le Page, who occupied his station in the after part of the voyage, I should feel myself much gratified.

I have the honor to be, with due consideration, and much respect, your obedient servant,

MERIWETHER LEWIS,
Captain, 1st U. S. Reg't Infantry.

Gen. H. DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

A Roll of the men who accompanied Captains Lewis and Clarke on their late tour to the Pacific Ocean, through the interior of the continent of North America, showing their rank, with some remarks on their respective merits and services.

No.	NAMES.	RANK.	REMARKS.
1	John Ordway, - -	Sergeant.
2	Nathaniel Pryor, - -	Do.
3	Charles Floyd, - -	Do.	Deceased the 20th of August, 1804. A young man of much merit. His father, who now resides in Kentucky, is a man much respected, though possessed of but moderate wealth. As the son has lost his life whilst on this service, I consider his father entitled to some gratuity, in consideration of his loss; and also, that the deceased being noticed in this way, will be a tribute but justly due to his merit.
4	Patrick Gass, - -	Do.
5	William Bratton, - -	Private,	Promoted to sergeant, 20th of August, 1804, in the place of Charles Floyd, deceased; in which capacity he continued until discharged at St. Louis, November 10, 1806.
6	John Collins, - -	Do.
7	John Colter, - -	Do.
8	Pierre Cruzatte, - -	Do.
9	Joseph Field, - -	Do.	Two of the most active and enterprising young men who accompanied us. It was their peculiar fate to have been engaged in all the most dangerous and difficult scenes of the voyage, in which they uniformly acquitted themselves with much honor.
10	Reuben Field, - -	Do.
11	Robert Frazier, - -	Do.	He has received the pay only of a private, though, besides the duties performed as such, he has rendered me very essential services as a French and English interpreter, and sometimes also as an Indian interpreter; therefore, I should think it only just that some small addition to his pay, as a private, should be added, though no such addition has, at any time, been promised by me.
12	Silas Goodrich, - -	Do.
13	George Gibson, - -	Do.
14	Thomas P. Howard, - -	Do.
15	Hugh Hall, - -	Do.
16	Francis Labuicke, - -	Do.
17	Hugh M'Neal, - -	Do.
18	John Shields, - -	Do.	Has received the pay only of a private. Nothing was more peculiarly useful to us, in various situations, than the skill and ingenuity of this man as an artist, in repairing our guns, accoutrements, &c. and should it be thought proper to allow him something as an artificer, he has well deserved it.
19	George Shannon, - -	Do.
20	John Potts, - -	Do.	Entitled to no peculiar merit: was enlisted at Fort Mandan, on the 2d of November, 1804, in order to supply the deficiency in my permanent party, occasioned by the discharge of John Newman. He performed the tour to the Pacific Ocean, and returned to St. Louis, where he was discharged, in common with others, on the 10th of November last. As he did not perform the labors incident to the summer of 1804, it would be proper to give him the gratuity only of two-thirds as much as is given to others of his rank.
21	John Baptiste Le Page, - -	Do.
22	John B. Thompson, - -	Do.
23	William Werner, - -	Do.
24	Richard Windsor, - -	Do.
25	Peter Wiser, - -	Do.
26	Alexander Willard, - -	Do.
27	Joseph Whitehouse, - -	Do.
28	George Drulyard, - -	Interpreter.	A man of much merit; he has been peculiarly useful from his knowledge of the common language of gesticulation, and his uncommon skill as a hunter and woodsman; those several duties he performed in good faith, and with an ardor which deserves the highest commendation. It was his fate also to have encountered, on various occasions, with either Captain Clarke or myself, all the most dangerous and trying scenes of the voyage, in which he uniformly acquitted himself with honor. He has served the complete term of the whole tour, and received only 25 dollars per month, and one ration per day, while I am informed that it is not unusual for individuals, in similar employments; to receive 30 dollars per month.
29	Nouisant Carbono, - -	Do.
			A man of no peculiar merit; was useful as an interpreter only, in which capacity he discharged his duties with good faith, from the moment of our departure from the Mandans, on the 7th of April, 1805, until our return to that place in August last, and received, as a compensation, 25 dollars per month, while in service.

GENERAL REMARK.

With respect to all those persons whose names are entered on this roll, I feel a peculiar pleasure in declaring, that the ample support which they gave me under every difficulty; the manly firmness which they evinced on every necessary occasion; and the patience and fortitude with which they submitted to, and bore, the fatigues and painful sufferings incident to my late tour to the Pacific Ocean, entitles them to my warmest approbation and thanks; nor will I suppress the expression of a hope, that the recollection of services, thus faithfully performed, will meet a just reward, in an ample remuneration on the part of our Government.

MERIWETHER LEWIS,
Captain 1st U. S. Reg't Inf.

DEFENCE OF THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 29TH OF OCTOBER, 1807.

ALBANY, March 27, 1807.

SIR: Pursuant to the orders of the Senate and Assembly of this State, we have the honor to enclose you their joint resolutions, relative to the protection of the port of New York.

With sentiments of high consideration, we are, sir, your obedient humble servants,

JOHN BROOM,

President of the Senate.

A. M'CORD,

Speaker of the House of Assembly.

NATHANIEL MACON, Esq.

Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

STATE OF NEW-YORK, March 20, 1807.

Resolved, As the sense of this Legislature, that every consideration of policy and duty requires, that adequate measures should be adopted by the National Government, for the protection of the port of New York,

That the agricultural, as well as commercial interests of the State, are deeply interested in this most desirable object.

That, in surrendering to the United States the revenue arising from imposts, this State anticipated, and has now a right to expect, that a competent portion of that revenue would be appropriated for its defence, and that the Congress of the United States are bound by their constitutional duties, as guardians of the common defence and general welfare, to satisfy this proper and reasonable expectation.

Resolved, That an application be made to the President of the United States, in behalf of this State, to fix upon a plan of durable and permanent defence for the port of New York, fully adequate to the importance of the object, and that he be also respectfully requested to appropriate, out of the moneys placed at his disposal, as large a sum as can be usefully expended for that purpose, until Congress shall have it in their power to make further provision in the premises.

Resolved, That the Legislature of this State fully approve of the conduct of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, in advocating and enforcing the claims of this State, in this respect, and that they be requested to support and enforce such further measures as may be necessary for the permanent defence of this State, and to obtain, either by annual appropriation, or by general provision, a sum competent to that important object.

Resolved, That three copies of the above resolutions be signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the Assembly, and that they be requested to transmit one of the said copies to the President of the United States, one to the President of the Senate, and one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

No. 71.

[1st Session.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A FOUNDRY, AND THE SALE OF ARMS TO THE STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 19, 1807.

MR. DAWSON, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the message of the President of the United States which relates to our military and naval establishments, and a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of selling to individual States arms owned by the United States, made the following report, in part:*

Resolved, That a sum of money, not exceeding ——— thousand dollars, be appropriated for the purpose of building a national foundry in the city of Washington, for casting ordnance.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be authorized, under the direction of the President of the United States, to sell to individual States, which may wish to purchase, any arms owned by the United States, and which may be parted with without injury to the public.

Letter from Henry Foxall to the Secretary of War, dated Columbia Foundry, August, 1807, relative to a National Foundry.

HONORED SIR:

I shall now endeavor to make some remarks on the substance of several conversations that have passed between us, on the subject of a large foundry and boring mill, intended solely for public use.

I find your wish is to have such an establishment erected as soon as the nature of the thing will admit of it. I also find, or at least I think I do, that it is not in any addition to the works I have already in operation in Georgetown that would be satisfactory, but one to be built on the public land on Greenleaf's Point, city of Washington.

Your wish for my establishing such a work in that place, at once presented to my view several difficulties, which did, and still do, appear insurmountable, at least to my becoming proprietor of such a concern, a few of which I shall candidly notice for your consideration.

Although I have been, for aught I know, successful in giving general satisfaction in my professional habits as a man of business, to every department for which I have been engaged, and cheerfully acknowledge the obligations I am under to the administrators thereof for the attention I have constantly received from them; yet, it is possible, this might not always be the case; I might not always be so fortunate as to please. Was I to erect so large an establishment as is contemplated, at my own expense, I should stand in an enviable situation (or it might be thought so) by gentlemen of my profession; an attempt no doubt would be made to wrest the business out of my hands, or leave it with me not worth following. But, if none of these difficulties, with many more I could mention, should take place, there is one which I earnestly hope will arise, which is this—that Government will not stand in need of such an establishment to be kept constantly in operation. Although it is absolutely necessary that a government like ours should have such an establishment under their control, independent of all private ones through the continent, (which can be called in to their aid on so much better terms in all cases of emergency) nevertheless it does not follow that this itself will be kept in continual operation.

* For the report, see No. 73.

I should suppose a few years would give you a sufficiency of ordnance for your forts, your garrisons, and your ships, and this before any adequate return could be made of the expense of building the works. Were I to build the works on my own land, and no longer wanted for the public, I might convert them into mills for making flour, or some other manufactory; but were they built on your land, that would be out of the question. No person could be found to purchase my right at a time you had no orders to give; and I suppose the public would find a disinclination to purchase property they had no immediate use of. Under this view of the subject, the works would at times be useless to the United States, and, in the end, destructive to me; and at the time, I might have no just cause of complaint, yet should be left without remedy. When we were on the spot at Greenleaf's Point, looking at the situation, I saw it was good, and the conveniences for its adoption many. But how the plan could be effected by me, to mutual advantage, I was at a loss to understand: for no sooner was one difficulty overcome, than another presented itself to my mind; nor did this view of the subject, which I am about to lay before you, strike my mind till after I parted with you. The more I consider it, the more unexceptionable it appears to me. In it you will have all you contemplated answered, and, it may be, some new ideas brought into view.

To erect a cannon manufactory in the city will require the agency of a steam engine, for the several purposes of turning, boring, &c. &c. This, with all the necessary buildings, say foundry, furnaces, boring mill, and all the component parts, I will undertake to build on Greenleaf's Point, for the United States, their extent and magnitude to be determined by you. I will engage to make all the models in brass or iron of the different calibers of every kind of ordnance, with complete iron flasks to each caliber; the patterns completely turned, with all the moulding and joints from end to end; and in the same way prepare moulds and flasks for all sizes of mortars, together with shot moulds turned complete.

I will establish in your factory a brass furnace for brass cannon, with turning machines, such as I have now in use, and in every way make it worthy of the name of a National Foundry, on as large, or on as small a scale as you may determine. The utility of metal models for casting cannon from, is not inconsiderable. It not only prevents a continual making and repairing of patterns: for, when the size and form are correctly ascertained, and a metal pattern made therefrom, it may be cast from for years, and every cannon, in size and form shall be alike. No extension from damp weather, or contraction from heat, will take place, which is always the case where wood is used for patterns. This is a part of the business I never yet attended to. The reason has been, I did not consider you would be willing to go into the expense; but you may be assured that every nation has them, or, at least, ought to have them, of every caliber, thus prepared.

I will now mention an idea that has struck me with much force, the propriety of which, I must leave you to be the judge. Might you not, within the limits of this establishment, have all your shops for smiths, carpenters, &c. &c. which are now fixed on that contracted spot at the end of Greenleaf's Point? You might take as much power from the steam engine as would be necessary to turn your lathes, grind stones, blow your smiths' fires, and many things now done by manual labor, and your place of deposit for mounted and unmounted cannon much better arranged.

I have now pointed out some of the advantages that would unquestionably arise to Government by the establishment of such a work, and offer my services to them for the completion of it in all its parts, (the steam engine excepted, the building of which I do not pretend to understand) and all that I ask for erecting and putting into complete operation the establishment, is the use of the same, without rent or charge, with a contract sufficient to keep it at work for two years after its completion. It is proper for me to observe, that the plan I suggest does not go to necessitate or compel Government to manufacture their own ordnance because they are at the expense of erecting the works: for, after the two years are expired, should there be still a want of ordnance, I would gladly pay them a rent for the use of the works: that would be satisfactory, for as long a time as it might be necessary to keep them in operation.

I recollect you mentioned that it might possibly be the wish of the Government to have one or more young gentlemen instructed in the art of fabricating cannon, mortars, &c. I feel no objection of meeting your ideas on that score, under certain restrictions; what I mean is, for them not to be sent to me under the idea of power to control, but for the special purpose of being instructed.

Before I conclude this letter, permit me to make some few general observations on the whole. My reason for thinking the works ought to be built at the expense of the public in preference to any individual, is because they will derive much advantage therefrom, by having an establishment to resort to in case of emergency; but may I not say they ought in point of economy also: for they will have it in their power to ascertain the fair price that ought to be given for every article in that line, when they have to resort to contracts; and also, there can be an uniformity of artillery established by this means, which will be next to impossible in any other way. For, while officers are at liberty to give direction for ordnance according to their own ideas, the cannon will differ in size and shape in as many instances as there are officers empowered to give directions. And in this place, I will not only give it as an opinion, but state it as a fact, that we stand in the greatest need of a national regularity and uniformity with respect to ordnance.

I have been intimately acquainted with the heads of the Departments of War and Navy for about ten years past; not one of those gentlemen (till you came into office) ever pretended to depend on their own judgment what ought to be the dimension of any piece of ordnance; and the best it was possible for them to do, was to depend on the abilities of that officer in whom they had the greatest confidence. This has been the cause of the great diversity of size and shape of the same caliber which our arsenals, dock yards, and vessels of war present to the eye of the visiter.

Honored sir, I have to entreat you not to understand these remarks as reflections on the Government in general, or on any officer in particular, because that would be doing me injustice; but it is the importance of the subject I have now under consideration, which has called forth these remarks. But, lest I should tire your patience, I will here state but one more reason why I think it would be most proper for Government to build at their own expense; because they could then, without injury to an individual, set them in motion or let them stand unemployed, as suited their convenience.

I will now give you my opinion in point of the expense of erecting such an establishment. As there will be no land to purchase, I am of opinion that the works may be completed on a liberal scale, that is to say, the steam engine, foundry, boring mill, and the shops necessary thereto, for the sum of thirty thousand dollars. It may be extended to cost more, or one may be completed for less. The expense of patterns and flasks will be an additional charge, which will much depend on the materials, whether made of brass or iron, and the manner of finishing. As it regards the moneys necessary to carry on this work, I would observe, as the work would be for my use for a certain time after completed, I could wish the general impression was the same while building. If I make contracts in my own name, and become personally responsible for all engagements I enter into for materials bought, and men employed, I have no doubt but I shall get through the business with much less difficulty, in a shorter time, and with much less expense, than if it were built under the authority, and for the express purpose, of the United States' national works. All sums of money drawn from you on this account, I would hold myself accountable for, agreeable to a contract that should be entered into previous to the commencement of the undertaking.

I would cause to be kept a regular set of books of expenditures, together with taking care to have vouchers of all moneyed transactions, as far as practicable, which books and papers should be open at all times to the inspection of any person you might appoint, and, at the completion of the works, the books and papers to be given up into your hands. This security, together with some confidence I flatter myself Government has in my integrity, will, I should suppose, be a sufficient guarantee for moneys advanced, particularly as they are to be expended on their own premises.

While I have been endeavoring to throw my ideas together on paper, and give my opinion at large on the necessity and utility of a national foundry, I think you will agree with me that I have done it like one that had no establishment of the kind of his own, and not like one who has an establishment of the kind, and has nearly his all invested in it, and this done at the particular request of Government, and at the time they shall withdraw their aid and patronage therefrom, as a manufactory, with all its expensive machinery, become useless and of little value to me its proprietor.

The above is submitted to your consideration by your obliged servant,

HENRY FOXALL.

FORTIFICATIONS AND GUNBOATS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, NOVEMBER 24, 1807.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States, as relates to aggressions committed within our ports and waters by foreign armed vessels;* to violations of our jurisdiction; and to measures necessary for the protection of our ports and harbors, made the following report, further, in part:

That the numerous aggressions and violations of our jurisdiction, recently committed within our ports and waters by British ships of war, whether they are to be regarded as the effects of positive orders from the British Government, or as proceeding from that unrestrained insolence and rapacity in British naval commanders which previously produced the murder of our citizen John Pearce, and the perpetration of many other well remembered, outrageous, and irritating acts, are convincing proofs of the necessity of placing our ports and harbors, as speedily as possible, in a situation to protect from insult and injury the persons and property of our citizens living in our sea-port towns, or sailing in our own waters, and to preserve therein the respect due to the constituted authorities of the nation.

That the committee, having maturely considered the subject, are of opinion, that the protection desired can be best and most expeditiously afforded by means of land batteries and gun boats; as they have been induced to believe, that, by a judicious combination and use of these two powers, effectual protection can be given, even to our most important seaport towns, against ships of any size unaccompanied by an army.

That our most important ports and harbors, and those requiring the earliest attention, and the most expensive fortifications, are, New Orleans, Savannah, Charleston, S. C. Wilmington, N. C. Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, New London, Newport, R. I. Boston, Salem, Newburyport, Portsmouth, N. H. and Portland. And that the ports, harbors, and places, of minor importance, requiring protection, and which may be protected by less expensive works, are, St. Mary's, Georgia, Beaufort and Georgetown, S. C. Ocracock, Albemarle Sound, James river, York and Rappahannock rivers, Potomac, Patuxent, Annapolis and Eastern Shore, Maryland, Delaware bay and river, Egg Harbor, N. J. Amboy, Long Island, Connecticut Shore, Tiverton, R. I. New Bedford, Marblehead and Cape Ann, York, Kennebank and Saco, Kennebeck, Sheepscoot, Damariscotta, Broad Bay and St. George's, Penobscot, Frenchman's Bay, and Passamaquoddy Bay.

Wherefore, your committee, holding themselves bound by the tenor of the resolution referred to them, to report hereafter their opinion of the expediency of interdicting the waters of the United States to foreign armed vessels, according as circumstances, now unknown, may, when known, seem to require, submit the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States to cause such fortifications to be erected as, in addition to those heretofore built, will, with the assistance of gunboats, afford effectual protection to our ports and harbors, and preserve therein the respect due to the constituted authorities of the nation; and that there be, and hereby is, appropriated for that purpose, out of any moneys in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ——— dollars.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be built an additional number of gunboats, not exceeding ———, and to arm, equip, man, fit, and employ the same for the protection of our ports and harbors; and that there be, and hereby is, appropriated for that purpose, out of any moneys in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ———.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY, MARINE CORPS, AND NAVY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 2, 1807.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee to whom was referred "that part of the President's message which relates to our military and naval establishments," made the following report, in part:*

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the military establishment of the United States, by raising ——— regiments of infantry, to consist of ——— men each; ——— regiments of artillerists, of ——— men each; ——— regiments of riflemen, of ——— men each; and ——— regiments of cavalry, of ——— men each.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the marine corps, by raising ——— additional number of men.

3. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the speedy equipment of all the frigates and other vessels of war belonging to the United States; and, to render the establishment more effectual, that ——— ships, of ——— guns each, be built.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 20th, 1807.

SIR:

The committee to whom was referred "that part of the message of the President of the United States which relates to our military and naval establishments," having already received from this Department such information as it possesses on the subject of a foundry for casting cannon in the city of Washington, it only remains for the Secretary of War to state, in answer to your letter of the 16th instant, that the military peace establishment of the United States is composed of one regiment of artillery, consisting of twenty companies, of eighty-one men each, including officers and cadets; and of two regiments of infantry, of ten companies each, each company consisting of eighty men, officers included. The companies on the sea-board, on the Lakes, and upper Mississippi, are complete, or very nearly so; those on the lower Mississippi were, from the latest information, from sixty to seventy strong. The number of recruits at the different rendezvous are not accurately known, but are believed to be nearly sufficient to complete the regiments.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

FORTIFICATIONS AND GUNBOATS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE THIRD OF DECEMBER, 1807.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 16th of November last, "that part of the President's message which relates to the defence of our seaport towns and harbors, and the further provisions to be made for their security," made a further report, in part, of sundry documents on the subject; also, a bill making appropriation for the more effectual defence of the ports and harbors of the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 20, 1807.

SIR:

In compliance with the request of the committee, as stated in your letter of the 15th instant, I herewith enclose a statement I had the honor of making, by direction, and for the consideration of the President of the United States, on the subject of defence for our ports and harbors.

The aggregate of such an estimate, as circumstances permitted, for erecting the contemplated works, amounts to $750,000, in addition to former appropriations, and exclusive of the additional defence of New York, as noted under that head.

In considering the necessary defence for the respective ports and harbors, the aid of a suitable floating force was taken into view, but not into the estimate of expense, as that portion of the defence is not under the direction of the Department of War.

Should the committee desire any further information from this Department, either by a personal interview or otherwise, the Secretary will with pleasure attend them when requested, or furnish any documents or information in his possession, in relation to the object referred to the committee.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

HON. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, Chairman, &c.

The following statement exhibits, 1st. A list of ports and harbors that, from their importance in a commercial view, and their exposed situation to the attacks of an enemy, require a primary attention in the event of actual war, with a general description of the existing and contemplated works for the protection of each, together with such estimates of the necessary expenditures for said works, and of the number of gunboats requisite in aid of them, as the information at present possessed will permit. The estimate of expenditures are not generally from minute calculations, but from such information as to induce a belief that they will, in the aggregate, differ materially from the actual expense of the works contemplated.

2d. A list of ports and places of minor importance, with similar details.

1st. The more important Ports and Harbors.

NEW ORLEANS will require the erection and completion of the works heretofore contemplated, and now in a state of progress, viz: A strong work at Plaquemines, on the site of the present battery; a battery at the English Turn, (about twenty miles below New Orleans) with barracks; and a battery and block house at the mouth of Bayou St. John, on the margin of Lake Pontchartrain. The probable expense of which, in addition to the expense already incurred, will be ——. And, when completed, will, it is presumed, with a suitable number of cannon and men, and with the aid of — gunboats, afford a sufficient defence for that place.

SAVANNAH will require a regular enclosed work, with six heavy cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, and — gunboats. The probable expense of the works will not amount to less than —.

CHARLESTON, S. C.—It may not be improper to remark that, as soon as the commissioners of the State, and our engineer, shall have designated the sites as ceded by the Legislature, measures will be taken for the commencement of a strong work on the site of Fort Pinckney, and another at White Point, between the mouth of Ashley river and the city. Measures have been taken for procuring materials; and an engineer has been directed to forward these works with all practicable despatch. The probable expense, —.

An additional work is contemplated on Sullivan's Island, on or near the site of old Fort Moultrie. These works, and a train of heavy cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, (which has been directed to be placed in the town, under the immediate direction of the militia of the place) are, together with — gunboats, considered as capable of affording a sufficient defence for the town and harbor.

WILMINGTON, N. C.—Considerable sums of money have been expended on a new work on the site of old Fort Johnston, on Cape Fear river; it is yet unfinished, and will require an additional expense to complete the works.

A battery has been contemplated on Oak Point, near the mouth of the river, which will probably require an expenditure, including the completion of Fort Johnston, of —.

As no ship of force can approach the town, it is believed that the above works, with gunboats, would afford sufficient protection.

NORFOLK.—Fort Nelson is on a commanding site, and in good repair, but may require some additional support in the rear. A battery at Portsmouth, one on Hospital Point, and one on the site of the town, for the cover of heavy cannon on travelling carriages, aided by a suitable number of gunboats, are thought capable of affording a competent defence against any naval armament that can approach the town. The contemplated additional works will probably require —.

The number of gunboats for the defence of Hampton Roads, the mouth of the Chesapeake, and its immediate vicinity, should not be less than —.

In addition to the above contemplated works, it will probably be considered expedient to erect a strong enclosed work at or near the mouth of Lynnhaven creek.

BALTIMORE.—At the entrance of the harbor of Baltimore a regular enclosed fort of mason work was erected in 1798, 1799, and 1800, and will require but very little additional expense, except that of mounting an additional number of guns, which has been already directed, and will probably require an expenditure of —.

This work, with the aid of — gunboats, will, it is presumed, afford a sufficient protection for that port, especially while the floating force, proposed for the mouth of the bay, is in actual existence.

PHILADELPHIA.—Fort Mifflin, on an island in the Delaware, about eight miles below the city, is an enclosed work of masonry, and requires but little repair, except that of the gun carriages, which has been directed. But the strongest and most effectual defence of Philadelphia, against a naval force, has been established by nature, with some artificial aid. At a short distance below Fort Mifflin, a bar has been formed across the river, over which there are but about fifteen or sixteen feet of water; of course no ship of war, superior to a twenty gun ship, can pass at high water with her guns on board.

In the city there is a number of heavy cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, sufficient, with the aid of — gunboats, to destroy any small vessels of war that might venture and succeed in the passage of the bar and fort. Repair of carriages, &c. will probably occasion an expense of —.

NEW YORK.—In addition to Fort Columbus, (on Governor's Island) which is in great forwardness, and will be a strong regular work of the best materials, it has been considered necessary to erect a strong circular battery for two tier of cannon, one above the other, at the extreme westerly point of Governor's Island. A battery of a circular kind on Ellis's Island, enclosed in rear, a strong circular battery adjoining the front of the bastion of the old battery in front of the city; and a circular battery for one tier of cannon on a large block or wharf, to be established on the North River, at the northerly part of the city; and a strong redoubt on Bedloe's Island, for mortars and some heavy cannon, with a large train of heavy cannon on travelling carriages, with all necessary apparatus, deposited in an arsenal in front of the city, from whence they may be removed, with facility, to any part where they may be required; and about two miles to the northward of the front of the city a magazine and laboratory will be established for powder, and for fixing ammunition, with a small magazine for cartridges near each battery. When the abovementioned works shall be completed, it is presumed that, with the aid of from — to — gunboats, the city may be defended against any naval force, unaccompanied with an army; but, as a further security, batteries ultimately at Robins's Reef, or the Narrows, or at both, may be of use. The probable expense of the works first contemplated (and for the immediate commencement of which, directions have been given to the principal engineer, and to the agent for furnishing materials and workmen) no accurate estimate has yet been made, but will, it is presumed, in addition to the completion of Fort Columbus, require a sum of not less than —.

NORF.—If, in addition to the above works, a defence obstructing the channel by sinking blocks, as contemplated, with a strong work for covering the line of blocks, should be decided on, an additional sum will be necessary, of not less than —.

NEW LONDON is situated on the bank of the River Thames, three or four miles from its mouth. The town of Groton is on the opposite side of the river, and Norwich about fifteen or sixteen miles higher up. The harbor or mouth of the river is free from any obstructions, and has sufficient depth of water for large ships. About one mile below the town is Fort Trumbull, on a commanding point. This fort will require some repair; and, when aided by — gunboats, will probably afford a reasonable security to the towns on the river. The probable expense, —.

NEWPORT, R. I.—Large sums of money were expended in the years 1795, 1799, and 1800, in fortifications for the defence of this port. Two enclosed works, for the more immediate defence of the town, were erected, and several others commenced, one of which was on an extensive scale; but, had the whole been completed, they could only afford protection against one line of approach, for ships of war, while two others, with sufficient depth of water, remained unguarded. In fact, the different channels by which ships of war can conveniently approach the Island of Rhode Island, renders it so nearly impracticable, without an army, to prevent their approach, as to necessarily reduce a system of defence to the mere front of the town of Newport, which is now covered with two enclosed works, and which, with the necessary repair of those works, some heavy cannon on travelling carriages, placed in the town, and the aid of — or — gunboats, may be sufficiently protected against ships of war, unaccompanied by an army. The same floating force contemplated for Newport may extend a protection to Providence, Bristol, and other places on the same waters.

The sum probably necessary for repairs, &c. at Newport, may be estimated at —.

BOSTON.—In defence of the harbor of Boston a regular fort, composed of the best materials, has been erected on the site of the old works, on Castle Island, about three miles below the town. In addition to this fort, it has been considered necessary, in the event of a war, to erect a small enclosed work on an island which bounds the opposite side of the channel to Fort Independence.

Temporary batteries may be necessary on some of the adjacent heights. With these several works, aided by — gunboats, it is presumed that the harbor and town could be defended against any naval force, unattended by an army, that may be reasonably expected.

SALEM AND NEWBURYPORT.—Batteries and block houses repaired and strengthened, with two cannons at each place, mounted on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats; — for Salem and — for Newburyport. Probable expense, —.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.—The harbor of Portsmouth is open, with a sufficient depth of water for ships of the line, to some distance above the town, which is situated but three miles from the entrance of the harbor, where is an ancient work, which has been repaired and improved from time to time, and now requires additional improvements. Between the fort and town there were, in the course of our Revolutionary war, two strong works erected on opposite sides of a narrow pass in the river; but, having been principally constructed of earth, are now in ruins. Batteries on the sites of those works will be necessary, as well as some moveable heavy cannon in the town, which, together with — gunboats, when completed, may be considered as a sufficient defence for that place. The expense for fortifications will probably amount to —.

PORTLAND.—The town of Portland is on the margin of an open capacious harbor, sufficient for the reception of an immense fleet, and at so small a distance from the ocean as to render the approach of an enemy easy and sudden. A battery and block house were erected for its defence (near the town) in the year 1795 or 1796. It being impracticable to defend the harbor by batteries, against the approach of ships of war, a defence for the town is all that can be contemplated; for which purpose some additional batteries, with the repairs of the existing works, may, with moveable heavy cannon, and some floating force, equal to — gunboats, be considered as sufficient. The expense necessary for fortifications may be —.

2dly. Ports and Harbors of minor importance.

ST. MARY'S, GEO.—This place will require a small battery and block house, and two heavy cannon mounted on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats. Probable expense, —.

Also, — additional gunboats may be necessary between St. Mary's and Savannah.

BEAUFORT will require a battery and block house. Probable expense, —.

GEORGETOWN, S. C.—This place is extremely difficult to approach by water, but it may be proper to erect a small battery for two heavy cannon on travelling carriages, to be aided by — gunboats.

OCRACOCK.—The passage over Ocracock bar is like the mouth of a funnel to the waters of North Carolina, except Cape Fear river, and several small inlets for shallops. On Ocracock bar there are twelve feet water, but a few miles from the bar, in the only channel for vessels of burthen; there is a place called the Swash, over which are only eight feet water, of course large vessels are obliged to take out a considerable part of their cargoes by the help of lighters, from which, after passing the Swash, they again receive them. Outward bound vessels being obliged to wait some time for receiving their cargoes from the lighters, in what is called Wallace's Channel, within two or three miles of the bar, it frequently happens that twenty or thirty vessels are lying together in that channel, waiting for a favorable time to go out; and, while so situated, might become an easy prey to a single privateer or small sloop of war. A battery on the shell flats, near the light house, for four or six cannon, aided by — gunboats, would probably afford sufficient security. The expense of a battery in mason work, (for no other would stand any time) including a small magazine and guard house, will be, ———.

ALBEMARLE SOUND may require — light gunboats, to guard against small privateers that may enter Currituck or New Inlet, with a small battery at Edenton. Probable expense, ———.

JAMES RIVER.—At a place called Hood's Point (considered a commanding position) a strong battery, covered by a redoubt, may, perhaps, when aided by the floating force below, be considered a sufficient defence for the towns above. Probable expense, ———.

YORK RIVER AND RAPPAHANNOCK.—For each a battery and block house. Probable expense, ———.

POTOMAC.—Digges' Point, below Alexandria, is a commanding position; and, with a strong battery, covered by a redoubt and two block houses on the highest parts of the adjacent eminence, would, with — gunboats, render sufficient protection to Alexandria, the City of Washington, and Georgetown, against the approach of any such naval force as could be reasonably contemplated. Probable expense, ———.

PATUXENT.—A battery and block house. Probable expense, ———.

ANNAPOLIS, Md. and Eastern Shore of Maryland. Probable expense, ———.

DELAWARE BAY AND RIVER.—A battery and block house at some place on the Bay, as a cover for — gunboats; also batteries near Newcastle and Wilmington. Probable expense, ———.

EGG HARBOR, N. J.—This place will require a battery for a few cannon, and a block house, aided by — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

AMBOY will require a battery, and probably two block houses, aided by — gunboats.

LONG ISLAND.—From Frog's Neck eastward, two or three small batteries and block houses, and some cannon on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

CONNECTICUT SHORE.—The ports in Connecticut, on the Sound, (exclusive of New London) may require five or six small batteries and block houses, aided by — gunboats. Expense, ———.

TIVERTON, R. I.—A Small battery and block house, with one cannon on a travelling carriage, and — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

NEW BEDFORD.—Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Barnstable, Plymouth, and Duxbury, each a battery, with — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

MARBLEHEAD AND CAPE ANN.—Batteries of block houses repaired and strengthened, with two cannon, at each place, on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats at each. Probable expense, ———.

YORK, KENNEBUNK, AND SACO.—At each a small battery, — gunboats at each of the two latter places. Probable expense, ———.

KENNEBECK, SHEEPS CUT, DAMARIES, SCOTTA, BROAD BAY, AND St. GEORGE'S, each a small battery and two cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

PENOBSCOT.—A strong battery and block house, aided by — gunboats. Probable expense, ———.

FRENCHMAN'S BAY AND MACHIAS.—Two or three small batteries, and three cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, aided by — gunboats. Expense, ———.

PASSAMAQUODDY BAY.—Two batteries and a block house, aided by — gunboats on a large scale. Probable expense, ———.

GENERAL.—Other places, not mentioned, may require some defence, for which it may be proper to add ———.

MILITARY FORCE IN 1807.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 3, 1807.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1807.

SIR:

I have the honor, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th ult. to transmit, herewith, a statement of the respective numbers of officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers, composing the army of the United States, noting the number wanting to complete the present establishment.

I beg leave also to state, that, in addition to the directions given in July last, letters were written on the 22d day of October, ult. to each of the Governors of the several States, from whom no reports had been received, urging the necessity of their forwarding to this Department, with as little delay as possible, the muster rolls and inspection returns of their respective quotas of one hundred thousand militia. A small proportion of the returns, however, have as yet been received: And, as the Governors were generally authorized by the President of the United States to accept, as a part of their respective quotas, such volunteer corps as might offer their services, in conformity to the act of Congress of the 24th of February last, the Secretary of War will not possess the necessary documents for forming the statement, directed to be laid before the House, by their resolution of the same date as the former, until he shall receive the returns before mentioned. There is reason, however, to expect, that they will generally be in his possession within a short time, as it appears, as far as answers have been received from the Governors to the letters addressed to them as above stated, that every exertion has been made, on their part, to have the returns completed and forwarded.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

To the Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

A Statement of the respective numbers of Officers, Non-commissioned Officers, and Soldiers, composing the Army of the United States, agreeably to the act fixing the military peace establishment, passed March 16, 1802, and to the several acts in addition thereto.

GENERAL AND OTHER STAFF.

1 Brigadier General,	27 Assistant military agents, taken from the line,
1 Aid-de-Camp, taken from the line,	7 Paymasters of districts, do.
1 Adjutant and Inspector, do.	2 Assistant paymasters, do.
1 Paymaster of the army,	2 Surgeons; 1 wanting to complete the number,
3 Military agents,	31 Surgeons' mates; 4 do. do.

ONE REGIMENT OF ARTILLERISTS.

1 Colonel,	40 Cadets; 11 wanting to complete the number,
1 Lieutenant Colonel,	2 Teachers of music,
4 Majors,	80 Sergeants,
1 Adjutant, taken from the line,	80 Corporals,
20 Captains,	80 Musicians,
20 First Lieutenants,	160 Artificers,
20 Second Lieutenants,	1,120 Privates.

TWO REGIMENTS OF INFANTRY.

2 Colonels,	20 Ensigns,
2 Lieutenant Colonels,	4 Teachers of music,
2 Majors,	2 Sergeant Majors,
2 Adjutants, taken from the line,	80 Sergeants,
20 Captains,	80 Corporals,
20 First Lieutenants,	80 Musicians,
20 Second Lieutenants,	1,280 Privates.

NOTE.—It appears from the latest returns, that about two hundred privates are wanted to complete the establishment. It is believed, however, although not accurately known, that the number of recruits at the different rendezvous is nearly sufficient to supply the deficiency.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS AT PRESENT CONSISTS OF

1 Lieutenant Colonel,	6 Cadets,
1 Major,	1 Teacher of French language,
3 Captains,	1 Do. of drawing,
3 First Lieutenants,	1 Corporal,

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 8, 1807.

A report of the Secretary of War, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States, of the first instant, directing him to lay before the House, an account of the state of the fortifications of the respective ports and harbors of the United States, with a statement of the moneys appropriated for fortifications, and remaining unexpended; and an estimate of the sums necessary for completing such fortifications, as may be deemed requisite for their defence.

DISTRICT OF MAINE.

FORT SUMNER, Portland.—A small enclosed work with a block house, magazine, and barracks, and a detached battery, near the water, for heavy cannon, with a store house and furnace for heating cannon ball; authorized by an act of Congress, of March, 1794. The sites of the works were injudiciously selected; new ones will be necessary.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

FORT CONSTITUTION, Portsmouth.—The remains of an ancient fortification, which have been repaired at different periods. Considerable progress has been made within the last three months in the improvement of the works.

MASSACHUSETTS.

CAPE ANN.—Fortifications authorized by act of Congress, of the 20th of March, 1794. A block house and a battery were erected; but are now out of repair.

SALEM.—A block house, magazine, and battery, authorized by act of Congress, of March 20th, 1794; out of repair.

MARBLEHEAD.—A block house, magazine, and battery, authorized by act of Congress, of March 20th, 1794; wanting repairs.

FORT INDEPENDENCE, Boston Harbor.—A regular, strong, enclosed work of masonry, with magazine, quarters, barracks, and other buildings, commenced in the year 1800, and completed in 1803; in good repair.

RHODE ISLAND.

FORTS ADAMS AND WOLCOTT, Newport.—Two enclosed works, with batteries, magazines, and barracks; and in addition to a stone tower at the entrance of the harbor, and a blockhouse and battery on Rhode Island, near the town of Newport, an extensive regular fort, was commenced on a small island, but no part completed, except a range of stone barracks. These works were principally erected in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800. To complete the whole would require very large expenditures; and when completed, would not, in the smallest degree, annoy ships of war, but in one of three open and convenient passages, by which Rhode Island may be approached. The two first mentioned works have recently been put into a tolerable state of defence.

CONNECTICUT.

FORT TRUMBULL, New London.—Fortified in the course of our Revolutionary war. Several repairs have been made, at different periods, since, with considerable improvements; further repairs are necessary.

NEW YORK.

FORT COLUMBUS, New York Harbor.—An enclosed work of earth and wood, on Governor's Island, has, within the two last years, been improved, and faced with permanent mason work, and is nearly completed, and may be considered as a strong, well constructed, regular fort. A strong, marine, casemated battery has been commenced on the extreme western point of the same island; and some progress has been made in forming foundations, for batteries, at other points in the vicinity of the city; a train of heavy cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, has been placed in the city.

PENNSYLVANIA.

FORT MIFFLIN, on Mud Island, below Philadelphia.—A regular enclosed work, with batteries, magazines, and barracks, principally erected in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800, and now in a good state of defence.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON.—A selection and survey of a site for a fortification, authorized by the act of Congress, of the 20th March, 1794, but no works erected.

MARYLAND.

FORT MCHENRY, Baltimore Harbor.—A regular fortification of mason work, with batteries, magazine, and barracks, erected principally in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800; no considerable repair necessary.

ANNAPOLIS.—An examination and survey of a site for fortifications, but the works not completed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

ALEXANDRIA.—Temporary works, erected in the year 1795, now in ruins.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK, Fort Nelson.—Commenced in the year 1794; repaired and improved in the years 1802, 1803, and 1804, with extensive batteries, a magazine, and barracks. Considerable improvements and repairs are now progressing.

NORTH CAROLINA.

OCRACOCK HARBOR.—On an island called Beacon Island, a work was commenced in the year 1795, but not completed; and in the year 1799, measures were directed for the erection of an enclosed work, on the ruins of the former one; but from a belief that no work could be erected and supported at that place, which would afford any considerable protection to the harbor, none has been erected. It is presumed, that gun-boats would more securely protect that harbor than any fixed batteries which could be erected.

CAPE FEAR RIVER, Fort Johnston.—The site of an ancient fortification. In the years 1799, and 1800, some progress was made in erecting new works on the old site, which, from unfortunate arrangements and delays, on the part of the gentleman who contracted to complete them, are yet unfinished. When completed, they will be insufficient for the protection of the river, or the town of Wilmington, without the aid of gunboats, or other floating force.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

GEORGETOWN.—Some cannon were mounted in the year 1794, but no works erected.

CHARLESTON, Forts Moultrie, Pinckney, and Johnston.—The old forts are in a state of ruins; and, as no sites had been ceded and designated by the State for fortifications, until the month of August last, no effectual measures could, with propriety, be adopted, for the defence of the town and harbor, until within a few months past, in which time all necessary measures of preparation have been pursued for commencing and completing the contemplated works, on the most permanent and durable principles.

GEORGIA.

SAVANNAH AND ST. MARY'S, Fort Green.—On a small island called Cockspur, near the mouth of the river, irregular fortifications were erected, in the year 1794, with a battery, magazine, and barracks. In the year 1804, the works and barracks were totally destroyed, and a part of the garrison drowned by a storm, which occasioned such a rise of the water, as overflowed the island to a considerable depth; but as no cession has been made to the United States by the State of Georgia, of any suitable site or sites for permanent fortifications, and it not having been in the power of the Executive of the United States to procure any, on reasonable terms, either on the Savannah river or the St. Mary's, no considerable expense has been incurred on the sea coast of Georgia, for the last five years, and the garrison has been removed from St. Mary's as well as from Fort Green.

NEW ORLEANS.

FORTS ST. LOUIS, ST. CHARLES, AND ST. PHILIP.—The town of New Orleans is surrounded, except the front, by a mud wall, with three redoubts in the rear, and two in front; the two latter called forts. About fifty miles below the town, there is an ancient fortification, called St. Philip, with a battery, magazine, and barracks, which require considerable repairs and improvements.

At the junction of Bayou St. John, with Lake Pontchartrain, a small ancient work remains, intended to guard that communication with New Orleans, against the approach of an enemy, by way of the Lake. This work is out of repair, and will probably require considerable improvement.

Within the last twelve months, a considerable sum of money has been expended in repairing the ancient works about the town, and for materials and workmen for repairing the other works and erecting new ones.

As a considerable proportion of the accounts for expenditures on fortifications, for the present year, have been received and adjusted, a correct statement, as to the sum remaining unexpended, of former appropriations, cannot at present be made; but from such information as is now possessed, it is believed that not more than from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty thousand dollars remain unexpended at this time.

For erecting and repairing fortifications as contemplated, exclusive of a line of blocks, for the more effectual defence of New York, the aggregate estimate is nine hundred thousand dollars.

What sum will be necessary for the line of blocks, and a work for covering them, has not been fully estimated: it is presumed that it would require from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand dollars.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 26TH OF FEBRUARY 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The dangers to our country, arising from the contests of other nations, and the urgency of making preparation for whatever events might affect our relations with them, have been intimated in preceding messages to Congress. To secure ourselves by due precautions, an augmentation of our military force, as well regular as of volunteer militia, seems to be expedient. The precise extent of that augmentation cannot as yet be satisfactorily suggested: but that no time may be lost, and especially at a season deemed favorable to the object, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether they will authorize a commencement of this precautionary work, by a present provision for raising and organizing some additional force; reserving themselves to decide its ultimate extent on such views of our situation, as I may be enabled to present at a future day of the session.

If an increase of force be now approved, I submit to their consideration the outlines of a plan proposed in the enclosed letter from the Secretary of War.

I recommend also to the attention of Congress, the term at which the act of April 18, 1806, concerning the militia, will expire, and the effect of that expiration.

February 25, 1808.

TH: JEFFERSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 24th, 1808.

SIR:

I take the liberty of suggesting, whether, under existing circumstances, it would not be advisable to propose to Congress an augmentation of our regular troops, as soon as practicable; and also the engaging and organizing of twenty-four thousand volunteers, on the principles I have had the honor of proposing for your consideration; the general outlines of which are contained in the paper marked No. 1.

The number of regular troops which would propose being raised immediately, is six thousand, to be composed of suitable proportions of infantry, artillery, cavalry, and riflemen, and organized as stated in the enclosed paper, marked No. 2.

It may be presumed that, previous to the close of the present session, Congress will be possessed of such further information in regard to our foreign relations, as will be necessary for forming an ultimate opinion on the expediency or inexpediency of a greater augmentation of our army than is now proposed; and, in the mean time, measures may be taken for the recruiting service in different parts of the United States.

In the event of war, it will, I presume, be considered necessary to arrange our military force into separate departments, and to have a commander to each department; and, of course, to have no such officer as a commander in chief; and, until a larger army shall be raised than is now proposed, it may not be advisable to have any officers above the rank of Brigadier Generals; of that grade it may be proper to have four or five, as soon as a suitable proportion of the troops is raised.

With sentiments of the highest respect, I am, sir, your humble servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

No 1.

It is proposed to have engaged, in the several States and territories, twenty-four thousand volunteers, to be enlisted to serve twelve months in any twenty-four months within the term of five years, at such times and places as the President of the United States shall direct, to be armed and equipped by the United States, and to be regularly encamped in their respective States and territories, from two to three months in each year; and be exercised under the direction of inspectors to be appointed by the President of the United States, to receive pay and rations, and be furnished with camp equipage, and one suit of uniform clothing, once in three or four years; the officers, except the inspectors and paymasters, to be appointed by the respective States; the pay, annually, to commence the day they march for the respective encampments, and to continue until their return home, allowing one day for each twenty miles march to and from the encampment; no corporal punishments to be inflicted, but all offences to be punished by close confinement and short allowance or fines, or both; the commissioned officers to be governed by the rules and articles of war established for the regular army. The 24,000 to be apportioned on the States and territories in such proportion as circumstances may require, and in such proportions of infantry, artillery, cavalry, and riflemen, as the President of the United States shall direct, and organized into companies, battalions, regiments, and brigades, or other corps, as shall be found expedient, according to the numbers in each State, respectively; and to be encamped in the respective States and territories, at such time and place, or places, as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct.

No. 2.

The six thousand regular troops may consist of five regiments of infantry, one regiment of riflemen, one regiment of light artillery, and one regiment of light cavalry. The regiments of infantry, riflemen, and artillery, to consist of ten companies each, and the regiment of cavalry of eight companies. The field and staff of each regiment to consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one adjutant, one quartermaster, one paymaster, one surgeon, one surgeon's mate, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, and two principal musicians, and for the regiment of cavalry one riding master.

Each company of infantry and riflemen to consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, four musicians, and sixty eight privates.

Each company of artillery to consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, two cadets, four sergeants, four corporals, four musicians, eight artificers, and fifty-eight privates.

Each company of cavalry to consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one cornet, four sergeants, four corporals, two musicians, one saddler, one farrier, and thirty-eight privates.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 18, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The scale on which the Military Academy, at West Point, was originally established, is become too limited to furnish the number of well instructed subjects, in the different branches of artillery and engineering, which the public service calls for. The want of such characters is already sensibly felt, and will be increased with the enlargement of our plans of military preparation. The chief engineer having been instructed to consider the subject, and to propose an augmentation which might render the establishment commensurate with the present circumstances of our country, has made the report which I now transmit for the consideration of Congress.

The idea suggested by him of removing the institution to this place, is also worthy of attention. Besides the advantage of placing it under the immediate eye of the Government, it may render its benefits common to the Naval Department, and will furnish opportunities of selecting, on better information, the characters most qualified to fulfil the duties which the public service may call for.

TH: JEFFERSON.

March 18, 1808.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1808.

SIR:

In conformity to the commands of the President of the United States, I have the honor to transmit a report on the progress and present state of the Military Academy, with some suggested alterations, in which I have included those you had the goodness to point out.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JONA. WILLIAMS, Colonel of Engineers.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 14, 1808.

In obedience to the verbal commands of the President of the United States, the subscriber has the honor to submit, to the Secretary of War, the following report on the progress and present state of the military academy:

This institution was established at West Point, in the year 1801, under the direction of a private citizen, and was nothing more than a mathematical school for the few cadets that were then in service. It was soon found that the government of young military men was incompatible with the ordinary system of schools, and, consequently, this institution ran into disorder, and the teacher into contempt.

When the peace establishment was made, the corps of engineers was created, and the twenty-seventh section enacts that the corps "shall be stationed at West Point, in the State of New York, and shall constitute a military academy, and the engineers, assistant engineers, and cadets, shall be subject to do duty at such places, and on such service, as the President of the United States may direct." It was not probably foreseen, that, although the head quarters of the corps might be at West Point, yet the duties of the individual officers necessarily spread them along our coast from one extremity of the United States to the other; and as the whole number of officers can be no more than sixteen, they could not, in their dispersed state, constitute a military academy. The incongruity of a stationary and errant existence, in the same corps, has been amply exemplified by experience. Indeed, it never can be supposed that engineers, as such, could be efficient elementary teachers; their capability, consistent with other duties, is confined to practical teaching, by combining example with precept, and carrying the rudiments of the art into practical execution; in the same manner that other professional men generally have youth under their tuition, after they have gone through every branch of elementary learning relating to their profession.

A part only of the officers were appointed soon after the passage of the act, of whom the major, who was ex-officio the chief engineer, and two captains, took charge of the academy, the students of which were the cadets belonging to the regiment of artillery. The major occasionally read lectures on fortifications, gave practical lessons in the field, and taught the use of instruments generally. The two captains taught mathematics; the one in the line of geometrical, the other in that of algebraical demonstrations.

As the corps was small, as it had little or nothing to do in its more appropriate professional duties, and as the students were few, the institution went on producing all the effect in its power, and all that could be expected on its limited scale. It was soon discovered that mere mathematics would not make either an artilleryist or an engineer, and a power was given, by law, to appoint a teacher of drawing and of the French language. Had this law, instead of absolutely limiting the number of teachers and designating their duties, left it general in the discretion of the President to appoint such and so many as he might find requisite to produce the effect contemplated by the establishment, and left the internal organization to him, who, from constant observation, could judge of the most expedient one, with a reasonable but ample appropriation, we should, at this day, have a greater number of well instructed young officers than we can boast of. From that time to this, however, the academy has progressed beyond what could have been expected from its means; but now the first mathematical teacher has resigned, and the second has, for several years, been employed as Surveyor General of the United States in the Western country.

During the last year, a citizen, of eminent talents as a mathematician, has been employed as principal teacher, and a first lieutenant of engineers performed the duties of assistant teacher, while the professor of French and drawing confined his abilities to these branches. So far as talents can go, nothing is wanting as to these teachers; they are all capable in the highest degree: the subscriber is only apprehensive that he shall not be able to retain them. Mr. Hassler, the chief mathematician, is already designated for a survey of the coast, when circumstances shall permit that business to be undertaken, and it could not be committed to more able hands. Mr. Mason, the professor of French and drawing, is a man of too great and too extensive abilities to be kept in a situation so much below his merit; this gentleman, being perfect master of the French and English languages, fully acquainted with all that has been written on the art of fortification, and eminently distinguished in science and general erudition, ought, in the opinion of the subscriber, to be placed at the head of what the French call Le Genie, which cannot be literally translated in its extensive sense. It signifies the art of an engineer, generally, in all its branches. Mr. Mason being the only teacher designated by the law, he is the only one that, exclusive of the corps of engineers, can be said to belong to the institution.

In short, the military academy, as it now stands, is like a foundling, barely existing among the mountains, and nurtured at a distance out of sight, and almost unknown to its legitimate parents. The questions that have been frequently put to the subscriber, by members of Congress, evidently show that the little interest the institution has excited arises solely from its being unknown to those who ought to be, and doubtless would willingly become, its generous guardians and powerful protectors. Had it been so attached to the Government (its real and only parent) as to be always with it, always in sight, and always in the way of its fostering care, it would probably have flourished, and have become an honorable and interesting appendage to the national family.

The question recurs, What ought to be done? The subscriber would wish the answer to arise out of the nature of the case, and carry with it a demonstration of its being founded in the most pure, though zealous regard for the public good. Actuated only by such motives, and without the stimulus of either ambition or interest, he begs leave to state, in the form of a proposition, what appears to him to be the natural and proper remedies.

First. Let the military academy be placed under the direction of the President of the United States in all that does or can relate to it, any thing contained in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Second. Let an academical staff be created in manner following; and as the regulations must necessarily be military, let the professors, when not of army rank, take that of their denominations (as relates to the academy only) in the manner of brevets:

1. The commanding officer of the corps of engineers to be ex-officio superintendent of the institution, with the power of appointing one of the officers or professors to do the duties of superintendent in his absence.

2. Let there be a professor of natural and experimental philosophy in all its branches; if taken from the corps of engineers and of lesser grade, let him have as much, in addition to his pay and emoluments, as will equal those of a lieutenant colonel; and if not of the corps, let these be his emoluments, and that his denomination, without similar rank in the army.

3. Let there be a professor of mathematics generally, with the pay, emoluments, and denomination of a major, and allowed to have two teachers under him, with the pay, emoluments, and denominations of captains: to this branch will expressly belong nautical astronomy, geography, and navigation.

4. Let there be a professor of the art of an engineer in all its branches, expressly to include fortification, attack, and defence, gunnery, and castrametation, with the pay, emoluments, and denomination, of a major, and allowed to have a drawing teacher, with a French teacher, and a German teacher, under him, with the pay, emoluments, and denomination of captains.

To this academical staff he begs leave to suggest the addition of the following professors; they are thus separately named, because they are supposed to be citizens engaged in other pursuits, and could only give a portion of their professional labors to this institution.

5. A professor of architecture, to be occasionally at the academy, and to give lectures, accompanied with demonstrations by models and specimens of the nature of the materials, of cements, of the composition of works, of bridges, causeways, canals, &c. &c. to be paid per diem, when on duty, and to be allowed quarters in the academy.

6. A professor of chemistry and mineralogy, on the same terms and conditions.

7. A riding master and teacher of the broad and small sword.

Third. With respect to the corps of engineers, whose functions have become extensive, let the following additions be made to it.

Two Captains,
Two first Lieutenants,
Two second Lieutenants,
Four Cadets,
Nine Artificers,
Thirty-one Men,

} The officers to be appointed, and the men to be engaged, on the same conditions as those now composing the corps.

The whole will then consist of twenty-two officers, eight cadets, fifty men, and ten artificers.

It will appear necessary to make, in the first instance, an appropriation for the proper buildings, apparatus, library, &c.; this being done, (and it should be remembered that, being once well done, it will be but one expense, not subject to repetition) it is presumed the annual appropriation would be inconsiderable; it might indeed be so connected with the appropriation for the corps of engineers, that all the surplusage of one would fall into the other, and the extension of the sum would not be felt.

It might be well to make the plan upon such a scale as not only to take in the minor officers of the navy, but, also, any youths from any of the States, who might wish for such an education, whether designed for the army or navy, or neither, and to let these be assessed to the value of their education, which might form a fund for extra or contingent expenses. On this plan it might be proper to suppress the ration system while the students are at the academy, and oblige all but commissioned officers to board in commons as in other universities. The citizen youth, so adopted, should be required to sign the articles of war, (for the time being) since it would be impossible, and improper if it were possible, to make any exceptions to the rules and regulations of the academy. As these youths grow up and take their stations in society, they would naturally become militia officers, and, in a few years, in the ordinary course of events, we should see an uniformity in our militia, resulting from a spirit of emulation, which the reputation of having received a military education would naturally excite, and the same duties, which have often been considered a burthen, would become a pleasurable privilege. There is nothing more fascinating to youth than excellence in arms, and a little knowledge will create a desire to acquire more.

That Congress may have as little trouble as possible, and to avoid a frequent recurrence to its authority on matters of course, it might, perhaps, be expedient to pass one short-act, naming the additions to be made to the corps of engineers, but placing the direction of the academy, external and internal, in the President of the United States, leaving the site, the buildings, the number and kind of professors, and all other matters connected with the institution, entirely to his judgment.

All which is most respectfully submitted,

JONA. WILLIAMS, Colonel of Engineers.

[1st Session.]

SITES FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 25TH OF MARCH, 1808.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In proceeding to carry into execution the act for fortifying our ports and harbors, it is found that the sites most advantageous for their defence, and sometimes the only sites competent to that defence, are, in some cases, the property of minors, incapable of giving a valid consent to their alienation; in others, belong to persons who may refuse altogether to alienate, or demand a compensation far beyond the liberal justice allowable in such cases. From these causes the defence of our seaboard, so necessary to be pressed during the present season, will, in various parts, be defeated, unless a remedy can be applied. With a view to this, I submit the case to the consideration of Congress, who, estimating its importance, and reviewing the powers vested in them by the constitution, combined with the amendment providing that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation, will decide on the course most proper to be pursued.

I am aware that, as the consent of the Legislature of the State, to the purchase of the site, may not, in some instances, have been previously obtained, exclusive legislation cannot be exercised therein by Congress, until that consent is given. But, in the mean time, it will be held under the same laws which protect the property of individuals, and other property of the United States, in the same State; and the Legislatures, at their next meetings, will have opportunities of doing what will be so evidently called for by the particular interest of their own State.

FIFTY THOUSAND VOLUNTEERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 26, 1807.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, and to whom was referred, on the 17th instant, a resolution of the House of Representatives, in the words following, to wit: "Resolved, That means ought to be immediately taken for placing the country in a more complete state of defence," reported the following resolution, in part:

Resolved, That it is expedient immediately to raise, arm, and equip, fifty thousand volunteers, to serve for the term of two years.

Will it not be advisable to propose raising an army of fifty thousand volunteers, to be engaged for two years, and to serve, if required for actual service, any proportion of the term, not exceeding twelve months, within the term for which they shall be engaged; each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, to receive ten dollars bounty, and each commissioned officer to receive one month's pay when appointed, and the whole to receive pay and rations when attending musters, as well as when in actual service. The non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be armed and equipped by the public, and to receive a uniform coat, vest, one pair of pantaloons, hat, two shirts, one pair of shoes and a blanket, and if called into actual service for any term over three months, to receive other articles of clothing in proportion to the term of service, not exceeding, in the whole, (including those first received) what are allowed to soldiers in the regular army for one year. The whole to be mustered and exercised in companies, four days within the first two months after being engaged, and six days in each succeeding year, and to meet and encamp in their respective States and territories, thirty days in each year; no man to be enlisted into any company whose place of residence shall not be within a reasonable distance from the company parade to which he shall belong. A suitable number of inspectors to be appointed by the President of the United States, to direct and inspect the exercise of the troops when encamped, and to give directions for the drilling and exercise of the companies, and to direct and receive all returns, muster and pay rolls, to be transmitted to an adjutant and inspector general, (to be appointed by the President of the United States) who shall give general instructions to all sub-inspectors for the drilling, exercise, discipline, and police, of the volunteers, when not in actual service. The officers to be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States. The proposed corps to include as many of the volunteers who have offered their services under the act of 24th February, 1807, as shall engage in the volunteer army now proposed. The whole to consist of 44,000 infantry, 3,000 artillery, and 3,000 riflemen, to be organised into companies of one hundred each, including officers, regiments of 1,000, brigades of 5,000, and divisions of 10,000 each; to have the usual staff, including surgeons and mates; the surgeons and mates to attend the annual encampment, and actual service, and to receive pay only for their actual services, at the same rate as allowed to regimental surgeons and mates, in the other corps of the army.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 3, 1809.

Mr. MACON, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message from the President of the United States as relates to revising and improving the militia system of the United States, made the following report:

That, having carefully examined the subject referred to them, are of opinion that it would not be proper, at this time, to make any alteration in the militia system of the United States.

[2d SESSION]

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 6, 1809.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress a statement of the works of defence which it has been thought necessary to provide, in the first instance, for the security of our seaport towns and harbors, and of the progress towards their completion. Their extent has been adapted to the scale of the appropriation; and to the circumstances of the several places.

The works undertaken at New York are calculated to annoy and endanger any naval force which shall enter the harbor, and still more one which should attempt to lie before the city. To prevent altogether the entrance of large vessels, a line of blocks across the harbor has been contemplated, and would, as is believed, with the auxiliary means already provided, render that city safe against naval enterprise. The expense as well as the importance of the work render it a subject proper for the special consideration of Congress.

At New Orleans two separate systems of defence are necessary, the one for the river, the other for the lake, which at present can give no aid to one another. The canal now leading from the lake, if continued into the river, would enable the armed vessels in both stations to unite, and to meet in conjunction an attack from either side. Half the aggregate force would then have the same effect as the whole; or the same force double the effect of what either can now have. It would also enable the vessels stationed in the lake, when attacked by superior force, to retire to a safer position in the river. The same considerations of expense and importance render this also a question for the special decision of Congress.

January 6, 1809.

TH: JEFFERSON.

REPORT.

SIR: I am now enabled, from the reports received from the respective engineers, to form a statement that will give you a general view of the works which have been erected or repaired, for the defence of our ports and harbors, and particularly of those which have been commenced the past season.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

Fort St. Charles, at the lower end of the city of New Orleans, and immediately on the bank of the river, is now in a good state of repair, with all its cannon mounted, with the necessary apparatus.

At the mouth of Bayou St. John, a strong new battery has been erected, which commands the passage from lake Pontchartrain to the city of New Orleans.

The battery of mason work, ordered to be erected at English Turn, is in such forwardness as to require but a few weeks for its completion.

A new fort of substantial mason work, has been commenced on the site of fort St. Philip at Plaquemines: the two main bastions are completed and the cannon mounted; and there is reason to believe that the fort will be completed in two or three months.

When the above works shall have been finished, it is believed that, with suitable garrisons and the number of gun boats destined for that quarter, they would afford such protection as had been contemplated.

GEORGIA.

Unavoidable delays in procuring the necessary sites have very much impeded the progress of the fortifications in this State.

As soon as a site could be obtained, a strong battery of mason work was commenced a few miles below the town of Savannah, at Five Fathom Hole, where large vessels generally take in their cargoes. This work is in such forwardness that it will probably be completed in the course of a few weeks.

A regular enclosed fort of mason work was directed to be built on the site of old Fort Wayne, near the town of Savannah, with a battery in front; a battery and redoubt or strong block house on Point Petre, at the mouth of St. Mary's river; and a small battery near Sunbury. The site for the fort near the town being private property, except a small part owned by the corporation, has been obtained with great difficulty, through the friendly aid of Doctor Jones and other gentlemen. All the titles are not yet conveyed to the United States, but it is expected the business will soon be completed. The unavoidable delays occasioned by these circumstances have necessarily postponed the commencement of the fort to so late a period, that it will not probably be finished earlier than next summer. No sites have yet been obtained for the proposed works at Point Petre and Sunbury.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The works in the harbor of Charleston are progressing with all possible despatch.

A new fort on the site of old Fort Mechanic, in the town of Charleston, was directed to be built of mason work. It is now completed and ready for the reception of a garrison: its situation is a commanding one.

The battery of Fort Johnston has been some time since finished, and is now completely mounted with heavy artillery.

Fort Moultrie, which is little inferior in magnitude and importance to any work in the United States, is now enclosed, and ready to receive a garrison.

A new fort of mason work on the site of old Fort Pinckney is commenced, and in a rapid state of progress.

A new brick arsenal in the town of Charleston has been built, and the public property moved into it.

It is believed, when the above works are completed and fully garrisoned, that they will, with the aid of the light and heavy artillery in the town, be adequate to such defence as has been contemplated.

A small battery for the immediate defence of Beaufort, S. C. with a magazine and barrack, had been ordered to be erected on the site of old Fort Lyttleton. But the land being the property of the State, and no cession having been made by her to the United States, nothing as yet has been done at this place.

A small battery, with a magazine and block house, was directed to be built at Georgetown, S. C. The works are progressing, and will soon be completed.

NORTH CAROLINA.

A battery of mason work and barracks were ordered to be erected at Old Topsail Inlet, near Beaufort, N. C. Although no regular report of the progress made at this place has been received, it is believed that the works are nearly completed.

The works at Fort Johnston, on Cape Fear river, with the magazine and barracks, are finished.

VIRGINIA.

Fort Nelson has been strengthened, and a large strong battery of mason work erected on the site of old Fort Norfolk, with brick barracks.

A site and materials for a strong battery at Hospital point, near Norfolk, have been procured, but too late for completing it the present season.

At Hoods, on James river, a strong battery of mason work has been erected, and a regular enclosed work, on an eminence commanding the battery, is in considerable forwardness, with barracks for two hundred men, nearly completed, including quarters for the officers.

MARYLAND.

Fort Washington, on the Potomac, between Alexandria and Mount Vernon, is a new enclosed work, of stone and brick masonry, to which is attached a strong battery of like materials. The whole is so nearly completed as to be ready for the reception of the cannon and garrison, which have been ordered, and have arrived at the fort. A stone tower has also been commenced on an eminence that overlooks the fort, and is in considerable forwardness.

A circular battery of mason work at Windmill point, for the protection and defence of Annapolis, is nearly completed—the cannon are mounted. Another battery on the bank of the Severn, below the town, is also nearly finished.

Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, is in a good state of defence.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The works at fort Mifflin have received considerable repair, and the cannon mounted. Some further repairs of carriages are said to be necessary, and have been directed.

NEW YORK.

Fort Jay, on Governor's Island, with the whole of its buildings, was demolished in 1806, except the walled counterscarp, the gate, sallyport, magazine, and two barracks; all the rest was removed as rubbish, to give place for a work composed of durable materials. On the site of the old fort, a new one (fort Columbus) has been erected, of the same shape, on three of its sides, as the former, with the addition of fourteen feet on each side. On the north side a ravelin has been added, with two retired casemated flanks. The new fort, with two new brick barracks, is now nearly completed, and has fifty cannon mounted.

On a point of rocks, at the western extremity of Governor's Island, a circular castle, of durable mason work, to be connected with fort Columbus by a zig-zag covered defile, has been commenced and completed to the second floor, and is now ready to receive its first tier of guns, which are mounted, and ready to be placed. The exterior diameter of this castle is two hundred and ten feet, and, when finished, will mount one hundred pieces of heavy ordnance.

On Bedloe's Island, a mortar battery commanding all the anchoring ground between Red Hook and the quarantine, and affording a protection to Ellis's island, has been commenced, and the front wall carried up to the intended height. Part of the redoubt in the rear has been excavated, but, as the season is too far advanced to begin any new piece of mason work, nothing more than a continuance of excavation and a collection of materials will be attempted this winter. Two brick barracks, consisting of only the walls and roof, have been raised another story and rendered habitable.

On Ellis or Oyster Island, advantageously situated for defending the entrance of North River, an open barbette battery for heavy ordnance on one platform had been ordered to be erected, and is now nearly completed. The platform is ready for the guns and the carriages mostly finished. The barracks within the old fort on this island have, by some alterations, been made habitable.

In addition to the works already described, a battery in North river, two hundred feet without the permanent line of the city, off Hubert street, has been commenced.

The foundation is of stone, and has been carried up to high water mark, in which situation it will remain till spring. This battery is connected with Hubert street by a bridge 200 feet long and 30 wide.

Preparations have also been made for erecting a heavy battery on a stone foundation with a superstructure of solid mason work at the southwest point of the city. The point selected has a complete command from the whole range of North river on one side to the complete width of East river on the other. Nothing more than the exterior blocks or counterguards for sinking the foundation can be effected this winter.

Connected with the plan of defence for the harbor and city of New York, the United States have purchased a house and yard in the rear of the custom house for the deposit and safe keeping of heavy artillery or travelling carriages, and all kinds of military stores, except powder. Since the purchase, a brick wall of nine feet in height has been erected round the yard. The United States have also obtained, at about two miles' distance from the city, a site containing nearly two acres, which has been enclosed with a wall nine feet high, and on which have been erected an arsenal, laboratory, and large powder magazine, from which the smaller deposits in the batteries can be supplied with ammunition.

At Sag Harbor, on Long Island, a small battery, with a magazine and barracks, had been ordered to be erected, and an agent appointed and supplied with funds for procuring the necessary materials; but, from the want of a sufficient number of engineers, to superintend the numerous works contemplated for the defence of our ports and harbors, nothing more has been done than to survey this harbor, and select a proper site for the battery.

CONNECTICUT.

In this State directions were given, and agents appointed and furnished with funds, for the erection of a battery, magazine, and barracks, for the defence of the harbor of New Haven; for the repair, improvement, and completion of Fort Trumbull, near New London; and for the erection of a small battery for the defence of Stonington. But the same want of engineers which has delayed the prosecution of the works at Sag Harbor and several other places, has also prevented any more being done in this State than merely to select the proper sites for the defence of New Haven and Stonington, and the examination of the state of the works at Fort Trumbull.

Heavy cannon, on travelling carriages, with apparatus and ammunition, have been ordered to these places.

RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT HARBOR.—At fort Wolcott and fort Adams some repairs have been made, and the works extended so as to admit some additional guns. The barracks at the latter have also been repaired.

On the main island, to the south of the town of Newport, a small battery has been erected, which commands the inner harbor between fort Wolcott and the town, and the channel between the two ports.

At Bristol, ten heavy cannon have been mounted on travelling carriages for the defence of that and other towns and harbors in its vicinity.

MASSACHUSETTS.

At the entrance of the inner harbor of New Bedford, two miles below the town, a small enclosed work has been erected of stone, brick, and sod. It commands the entrance into the harbor for a mile and a half in a direct line, is completed, and has a brick magazine and wooden barracks.

The old work on Gurnet head, near Plymouth, has been repaired, and platforms in front. A barrack and brick magazine have been built.

BOSTON HARBOR.—In addition to fort Independence, the following works have been erected for the defence of this harbor.

Fort Warren.—On the summit of Governor's Island an enclosed star fort, of mason work, with a brick barrack and quarters, magazine and guard house, has been completed. Fort Warren battery, on the south point of the same island, is completed of stone, brick, and sod, with a brick guard house and magazine. It is contemplated to erect a block house in the rear of this battery.

Westhead battery is staked out and materials collected. On a point formed by Charles and Mystic rivers; a battery has been built of sod, on a stone foundation.

SALEM.—The fort and block house, with a magazine under it, on a point at the entrance of this harbor, have been repaired and a new barrack erected.

MARBLEHEAD.—The fort at this place, with the magazine, barracks, and block house, has been repaired.

GLOUCESTER, CAPE ANN.—The old fort of stone, in front of this place, with the block house and magazine, has been repaired.

NEWBURYPORT.—On the point of Plum Island, at the mouth of Merrimack river, a battery of wood, filled in with sand and surmounted with sod, has been erected. It contains a barrack and brick magazine, and was constructed of wood on account of the shifting sands.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

PORTSMOUTH HARBOR.—Fort Constitution, on New Castle point, at the entrance of this harbor, is an enclosed work, built principally of stone masonry. It is now complete with the necessary buildings.

Fort McClary, a new strong work of masonry, has been erected on Kittery point, opposite fort Constitution. It is now finished with new barracks, magazine, and guard house.

DISTRICT OF MAINE.

PORTLAND HARBOR.—Fort Preble, a new enclosed work of stone and brick masonry, with a brick barrack, quarters, and magazine, is completed. This work is erected on Spring point, and commands the entrance of this harbor, through the main channel.

Fort Scammel, also a new work of similar materials, is erected on House island, opposite fort Preble, and commands the main and other channels. It is now completed with its block house and other buildings.

Fort Stinner battery, to the north of the town, has been repaired.

KENNEBECK.—At Shaw's point, on the west side and at the mouth of this river, a battery and brick magazine are completed, with a brick barrack ready for the accommodation of a small garrison.

SHEEPS CUTT.—On Davis's point, on the east side of this river, and about one mile below the town of Wiscasset, a strong battery, brick magazine, and a block house, are ready for immediate use.

DAMARISCOTTA.—On the southeastern angle of Narrow Island, in this river, and in the town of Boothbay, a battery and brick magazine are completed. A block house is begun, but not finished.

ST. GEORGE'S RIVER.—At Robinson's point, on the east side of this river, a small battery is begun, and materials provided for proceeding with the work as soon as the season will permit.

PENOBSCOTT AND BAGGADUCE RIVER.—Nothing more has been done on this river, than select a site and procure materials for a battery, which is on Perkins's point, on the north side of the river, opposite the northwest end of Noddles' Island.

MACHIAS.—A small battery has been erected at this place.

PASSAMAQUODDY.—A battery and block house have been erected, and a garrison placed in the works. Cannon have generally been mounted on the works now prepared for their reception, and will be ready for mounting on the others, as soon as they are in sufficient forwardness for the purpose.

Upwards of one hundred travelling carriages have been completed for heavy cannon, and a large proportion of them, with cannon and necessary apparatus, have been distributed in the various seaports.

The following sums have been advanced for the erection and repair of fortifications, and the construction of gun carriages, during the year 1808, viz:

For New Orleans, - - - - -	$80,373
Georgia, North and South Carolina, - - - - -	204,289
Virginia and Maryland, - - - - -	111,432
Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, - - - - -	5,000
New York, - - - - -	379,133
Connecticut and Rhode Island, - - - - -	11,000
Massachusetts and New Hampshire, - - - - -	223,475
	$1,014,702

For completing the works already commenced, and for erecting such others as have been contemplated, or may be deemed expedient, it is believed that an additional appropriation, to the amount of four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, will be necessary, exclusive of the expense of a line of block chains, &c. across the harbor of New York. The chain and timber for these blocks have been already procured, at an expense of upwards of 40,000 dollars; but, by the latest calculation made by persons considered as competent for the purpose, it appears that, to complete this plan, as heretofore proposed, would require an expenditure of one million of dollars.

For affording facility to that part of the contemplated defence of New Orleans, which depends on gunboats, a canal, from the river near the city to Lake Pontchartrain, of sufficient width and depth to admit, at all times, a passage for the gunboats stationed in the river and lake, would be highly important.

And as a company has been formed for the purpose of opening a canal from the lake to the city, by the way of the Bayou St. John, and proceeded far towards its completion, it is believed, from information received from said company, that, with the aid of ———, the canal may be extended, so as to open the communication as proposed above.

It is therefore submitted for consideration, whether an appropriation should be made to enable the President of the United States to effect so important an object.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 9, 1809.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 7th, 1809.

SIR:

In obedience to the resolution of the honorable Senate, of the 2d instant, requiring the Secretary of War to inquire and report to the Senate, whether it be expedient that one or more batteries or fortifications should be erected at or near Wilmington, at or near New Castle, at or near Port Penn, and at or near Lewis, in the State of Delaware, the Secretary begs leave to remark, that, from the general information obtained in relation to suitable sites for batteries, or other works, in the State of Delaware, it had been considered expedient to erect a battery of mason work, at or near the town of New Castle, and a similar one on the communication between the Delaware river and the town of Wilmington. The particular sites for these batteries were to have been designated by an engineer, and it was intended to have had the works erected in the course of the past year; but the principal engineer, under whose direction they were to have been constructed, not having a sufficient number of subordinate engineers to superintend the whole of the works contemplated within the district assigned him, was compelled to postpone the construction of those in Delaware, as well as others within his district. They will, however, be undoubtedly attended to in the course of the present year. The expense for these works was included in the general estimate; and it is presumed that no additional appropriation for them will be necessary. Whether it will be expedient to erect other works in the State of Delaware than those above mentioned, the information at present possessed by the Secretary of War will not enable him to decide.

All which is respectfully submitted, by your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

[1st SESSION.]

MODIFICATION OF THE LAWS RELATIVE TO THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 6, 1809.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 31, 1809.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th instant, requesting information on the following points:

"Is it expedient, in the present state of our foreign relations, and the threatening aspect upon our Western frontiers, to reduce the present military establishment?"

"If not, is it expedient to arrest the recruiting service; or, is it probable, from the progress that has heretofore been made in recruiting, that the number which may be enlisted before the next session of Congress, will be more than sufficient to fill up the vacancies which will probably arise from different casualties happening in the old and new regiments?"

"Is it expedient, at this time, to make any modifications of the laws relative to the military establishment?"

The enclosed statement contains the substance of the latest information which has been received from the Western frontiers.

This information encourages a belief that the precautions which have been taken will prevent the meditated attack on the post at Belle Vue, as well as discourage an execution of the hostile intentions of the Prophet and his allies. At the same time, it may be proper to observe, that this movement and hostile attitude of the savages, brings to view, and confirms, the correctness of the opinion of well informed men, and of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, as expressed in certain resolutions adopted by that honorable body on the 29th of January, 1809, that the posts at St. Louis and Detroit ought to be permanently strengthened.

Should the honorable committee be of opinion that the state of our foreign relations, taken in connexion with the information herein contained, renders it inexpedient to reduce the military establishment at this time, and that the recruiting service may be suspended, a discretionary power to renew it being vested in the President, will be an effectual security against any vacancies which may arise from different casualties; before the next session of Congress.

In answer to the last interrogatory, experience has shown that improvements may be made in the military establishment. That branch of business, which falls, properly, within the quartermaster's department, requires a new arrangement. Should the committee be disposed to bestow their consideration on this subject, I shall be happy in an opportunity of attending on them, or giving information respecting it, in any manner which they may be pleased to point out.

I am, with respectful consideration, your most obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Honorable JOSEPH ANDERSON,
Chairman of the Committee of the honorable Senate.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 6, 1809.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 2, 1809.

SIR:

In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th of May, requesting the President of the United States to cause the Secretary of War to lay before the House an estimate of the sums necessary to complete the fortifications commenced or contemplated; and also the amount of any deficiency of former appropriations for this object, I have the honor to state that, of the $450,000, appropriated by the act of February 10th, 1809, there are expended $265,000, leaving a balance of $185,000.

The difficulty of forming a correct opinion of the sums which will be required for each work, must be obvious, from the nature and extent of the business, and from the deficiency of all former calculations and estimates. From the best judgment which can be formed on the information and evidence in possession of this Department, the sum of $750,000, in addition to the balance before mentioned, will be sufficient, certainly, to cover the expenditures of the present year, and most probably to complete the system of defence contemplated by Government.

For the States East of New York,	-	-	-	-	$75,000
For the State of New York,	-	-	-	-	340,000
For the States South of New York, including New Orleans,	-	-	-	-	335,000
					$750,000

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 21, 1809.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 19th, 1809.

SIR:

I have the honor herewith to transmit to you a report of the state of the fortifications for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States,

And am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Report of Fortifications for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States.

DISTRICT OF MAINE.

PASSAMAQUODDY.—A circular battery of six guns, mounted, covered by a block house, with barracks for fifty men.

MACHIAS.—A circular battery of four guns, mounted, covered by a block house, with barracks for forty men.

PENOBSCOT.—A small enclosed work of four guns, mounted.

ST. GEORGE'S RIVER.—A small enclosed work of three guns, mounted.

BOOTH BAY, on Damariscotta.—A battery with three guns, mounted, covered by a block house.

EDGEComb, on Sheepscoot.—A battery with six guns, mounted, covered by a block house.

GEORGETOWN, mouth of Kennebec.—A small enclosed battery of six guns, mounted.

PORTLAND HARBOR.—Fort Preble, on Spring's point, at the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed star fort of masonry, with an elliptical battery in front, mounting fifteen guns, with brick barracks, for one company, officers included; a brick magazine. Fort Scammel, on the opposite side, three quarters of a mile distant; an enclosed semi-circular work, with two circular flanks of masonry, mounting eighteen guns, covered by a block house which will contain 40 men; a brick magazine. In the town of Portland, a battery of masonry, mounting five guns; also, a brick gun-house with four pieces mounted on travelling carriages.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Fort Constitution, at the entrance of the harbor at the mouth of Piscataqua river, three miles below Portsmouth; an enclosed work of masonry, mounting thirty-seven guns, with brick barracks, for one hundred and fifty men including officers; also two brick magazines.

PORTSMOUTH HARBOR.—At Kittery Point, an enclosed elliptical battery of masonry, mounting ten guns, covered with a redoubt of earth, with barracks for one company, including officers; also, a brick magazine. In the town of Portsmouth, a brick gun-house, containing six guns on travelling carriages, with harness complete.

MASSACHUSETTS.

NEWBURYPORT.—On the east point of Plum Island, at the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed battery of timber and earth, mounting five guns, with a brick magazine, and barracks of wood for twenty-five men.

CAPE ANN, Gloucester.—At the head of the harbor, a battery with seven guns, mounted, covered by a block house, which will contain twenty men.

SALEM.—Fort Pickering, on the west side of the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work of masonry and earth, mounting six guns, covered by a block-house, with barracks for thirty men, including officers and a magazine.

MARBLEHEAD.—Fort Sewall, at the west point of the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work of masonry and earth, mounting eight guns, covered by a block house, with barracks for forty men, including officers, and a magazine.

BOSTON HARBOR.—Fort Warren, on Governor's Island; a star fort, of masonry, with twelve guns mounted; a brick barrack for one company, including officers; also, a brick magazine and guard-house; on the south point and west head of the island, semi-circular batteries of masonry, calculated for ten guns each, ten guns mounted in the west head. Fort Independence, on Castle Island, south side of the inner harbor; an enclosed pentagon of five bastions of masonry, calculated for fifty guns; thirty-nine mounted, with two batteries to contain twenty-five guns; brick barracks for four hundred men including officers; also, a large brick magazine, built in 1801.

AT CHARLESTOWN.—Near the Navy Yard a small circular battery of six guns, with a brick gun-house, containing — guns, on travelling carriages; also, a stone and brick magazine.

PLYMOUTH HARBOR.—At Garnet head, the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work, repaired with stone and earth, mounting five guns, with a brick magazine, and barracks for thirty men.

NEW BEDFORD.—At Eldridge's point, commanding the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work of masonry, mounting six guns, with a brick magazine, and barracks for forty men, including officers.

RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT.—Fort Adams, on Brenton's point, entrance of the harbor; an enclosed indented work of masonry, calculated for twelve guns, six mounted, with a brick magazine, and barracks for one company, including officers. Fort Wolcott, on Goat Island, in the centre of the harbor; a star fort of stone, brick, and timber, mounting twelve guns, with flank batteries mounting eighteen guns; a brick magazine, and barracks for one company, including officers. On the Dumlumpling rocks, on the west side entrance of the harbor, a battery unfinished; on Rose Island, an enclosed work of four bastions of masonry, calculated for sixty guns, unfinished: all the works in this harbor were begun in the year 1798 and 1800. At Newport and Bristol, guns mounted on travelling carriages.

CONNECTICUT.

STONINGTON.—A gun house of brick, to contain four pieces of cannon on travelling carriages.

NEW LONDON.—An enclosed work, of masonry and earth, calculated for twenty-five guns, twelve mounted; with a magazine, and barracks for forty men, including officers, called Fort Trumbull.

NEW HAVEN.—A small work for the defence of the harbor, mounting six guns, with barracks for forty men.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK HARBOR.—Fort Columbus, on Governor's Island; an enclosed pentagonal work, with four bastions of masonry, calculated for one hundred guns, fifty-five mounted, with brick barracks for two hundred and thirty men, including officers. A stone and brick magazine; a castle, or stone tower, of three tiers, on a projecting point of the island, calculated for fifty-two heavy guns, under a bomb-proof cover, and forty-eight on the terrace; the lower tier finished, calculated for twenty-six guns, twelve mounted; guns may be placed in the second tier in case of necessity. The bomb-proof will serve as barracks for two or three hundred men.

On Bedloe's Island, on the opposite side of the harbor; an enclosed indented work of masonry, calculated for forty guns, unfinished.

On Ellis's Island, opposite Fort Columbus; an enclosed battery of masonry, calculated for twenty guns, eight mounted, with barracks for one company, including officers. At the West point of the city, near the old battery, a circular battery, calculated for thirty guns, has been commenced.

On Hudson river, at the termination of Hubert street, a battery of masonry, calculated for sixteen guns, finished. In the city of New York, an arsenal and store house of brick, with twenty-four guns, mounted on travelling carriages. Three miles above the city of New York, an arsenal, magazine, and laboratory, all of brick.

By the report received, it appears that seventy-one guns are actually mounted; one hundred and fifty may be actually brought into action on an emergency; and that the works for the defence of the city of New York are calculated for three hundred guns, and ten mortars, exclusive of those mounted on travelling carriages, and of the works on Staten Island, erected by the State of New York, calculated for eighty guns.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DELAWARE RIVER.—Fort Mifflin, on Delaware river, seven miles below Philadelphia; an enclosed work of masonry, defended by bastions, calculated for sixty guns, twenty-nine mounted; a water battery of eight guns mounted, with a brick magazine, and barracks for one hundred men, including officers.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON.—An arsenal of 96 by 26 feet, one and a half stories high; intended for cannon on travelling carriages, with their equipments.

NEW CASTLE.—The same as Wilmington.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE.—Fort McHenry, at the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed pentagon, with five bastions of masonry, calculated for forty guns, ten mounted; a water battery, of ten guns, mounted; a brick magazine; gun house, and barracks for two companies, including officers.

ANNAPOLIS.—Fort Madison, an enclosed work of masonry, comprehending a semi-elliptical face, with circular flanks, calculated for thirteen guns; with a brick magazine, and barracks for one company, including officers.

At Windmill point a circular battery of masonry, calculated for eleven guns, eight mounted. In the rear of the work quarters for two companies.

POTOMAC RIVER.—Fort Washington, an enclosed work of masonry, comprehending a semi-elliptical face, with circular flanks on the side next to the Potomac, mounting thirteen guns, commanded by a tower of masonry, calculated to mount six guns; with a brick magazine, and barracks for one hundred and twenty men, including officers.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK HARBOR.—Fort Nelson, on the west side of the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work of brick and earth, defended by half bastions, calculated for forty guns, thirty-three mounted; with a brick magazine, and barracks for two companies, including officers.

Fort Norfolk, on the opposite side; an enclosed work of masonry, calculated for thirty guns, ten mounted; with a brick magazine, and barracks for two companies, including officers.

NORTH CAROLINA.

WILMINGTON.—Fort Johnston, on Cape Fear river, — miles below Wilmington; an enclosed work and battery, calculated for twelve guns, four mounted; and barracks for forty men, unfinished.

BEAUFORT.—A small enclosed work, with five guns, mounted; and barracks for fifty men.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON HARBOR.—Fort Johnston, an enclosed work defended by bastions and batteries of masonry, calculated for forty guns, twenty-six mounted; with a brick magazine, and barracks for two companies.

Fort Moultrie, near the entrance of the harbor; an enclosed work defended by bastions and batteries of masonry, calculated for thirty guns, seven mounted; with a brick magazine, and barracks for two companies.

Fort Pinckney, an enclosed work of masonry for two tier of guns, nearly completed.

Fort Mchamie, in the town of Charleston; an enclosed work, and battery of masonry, with barracks; an arsenal for guns on travelling carriages.

BEAUFORT.—An enclosed work, and battery, unfinished.

GEORGIA.

SAVANNAH.—At Five Fathom Hole, three miles below the town; a battery of masonry, calculated for eight guns. Works have not been commenced in the town of Savannah, or at St. Mary's, the title to the lands selected for the sites at those places not having been obtained.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

NEW ORLEANS.—Fort St. Philip, at Plaquemine, near the mouth of the river; an enclosed work of masonry and wood, calculated for twenty guns; with a magazine, and barracks for one company.

English Turn, an enclosed work with two bastions, and a battery of masonry for nine guns; with a magazine, and barracks for one company, nearly finished.

At the Bayou St. John, a strong battery of six guns, which commands the passage of Lake Pontchartrain; with barracks for thirty men.

NOTE.—The foregoing report was referred to a select committee, to whom the Secretary of War made the following communication:

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 5, 1810.

SIR:

Conformably to the request contained in your letter of the 26th of January, I have the honor, herewith, to transmit to you the enclosed statement of the Accountant of this Department, exhibiting "the sums which have been expended out of the appropriations for fortifications, by the acts of February 10, and of June 14, 1809, and the particular sums expended on each fortification." It is not practicable to ascertain, with precision, the particular sum expended on each work respectively, as materials have, in some instances, been purchased by the agents and applied to different works in the same harbor, and, in some instances, to works not considered appurtenant to the port or place at which the disbursements have been charged.

The fortifications embraced in the report made to Congress at the present session, with the addition of those at Georgetown, S. C. (of which the return had not been received, but which are now reported as completed) and of those at Wilmington, N. C. not completed, comprehend the principal works projected by the former Secretary of War. They are considered permanent works, which are to be kept up.

To these should be added West Point, on Hudson river, and additional works on the island of Rhode Island. During the revolutionary war, the naturally strong post of West Point formed the point nearest to the ocean, which connected the Eastern and Southern States. The relation of this post to the city of New York, with its importance to the continent as a barrier station, in case a hostile fleet should be able to pass New York, render it highly expedient that the present works should be repaired, or that others, on an improved plan, should be constructed.

Rhode Island, from its insular and peculiarly exposed situation, offering to an invading fleet advantages not combined in any other port, requires additional means of defence.

The extensive fortifications projected, and in part constructed, by the State of New York, at the entrance of the harbor of New York, when ceded to the United States, will likewise be considered permanent works, and require a further appropriation.

Other fortifications, on a smaller scale, have been projected on the western frontier, and in several of the States. A want of satisfactory title to the ground which had been selected has occasioned delay in some instances. In others, they have not been commenced, for other reasons. A part of them are, at this time, in execution.

The sum already appropriated by law being deemed sufficient to complete the fortifications which have been projected, no further appropriation on account of fortifications has been suggested in the estimate of this Department for the year 1810.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Honorable JOHN CLOPTON.

Statement of the sums expended out of the appropriations for Fortifications, per acts of the 10th February, and 14th June, 1809, showing the particular Fortifications for which the expenditures have accrued, and the sums expended on each, respectively.

20,000 VOLUNTEERS AND A DETACHMENT OF 100,000 MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 3, 1810.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The act authorizing a detachment of one hundred thousand men from the militia, will expire on the 30th of March next. Its early revival is recommended, in order that timely steps may be taken for arrangements, such as the act contemplated.

Without interfering with the modifications rendered necessary by the defects, or the inefficacy, of the laws restrictive of commerce and navigation, or with the policy of disallowing to foreign armed vessels the use of our waters, it falls within my duty to recommend, also, that, in addition to the precautionary measure authorized by that act, and to the regular troops, for completing the legal establishment of which enlistments are renewed, every necessary provision may be made for a volunteer force of twenty thousand men, to be enlisted for a short period, and held in a state of organization and readiness for actual service, at the shortest warning.

I submit to the consideration of Congress, moreover, the expediency of such a classification and organization of the militia, as will best ensure prompt and successive aids, from that source, adequate to emergencies which may call for them.

It will rest with them, also, to determine how far further provision may be expedient, for putting into actual service, if necessary, any part of the naval armament not now employed.

At a period presenting features in the conduct of foreign Powers towards the United States, which impose on them the necessity of precautionary measures involving expense, it is a happy consideration, that such is the solid state of the public credit, that reliance may be justly placed on any legal provision that may be made for resorting to it, in a convenient form, and to an adequate amount.

JAMES MADISON.

MILITARY FORCE AND ITS DISPOSITION IN 1810.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 1, 1810.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 30, 1810.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 22d inst. I have the honor to transmit you the following returns, marked A, B, and C.

A exhibits a general return of the troops of the United States, composing the military peace establishment and the additional military force, specifying the particular force of each regiment and corps, taken from the latest returns received by the adjutant and inspector of the army, to the 28th of November, 1809; to which is subjoined the present disposition of the general and field officers.

B. A return of the regular forces allotted for the defence of New Orleans, comprehending those of the military peace establishment on that station, and the additional military force ordered there on the 2d December, 1808.

C. The disposition and effective strength of the additional military force ordered for the defence of New Orleans, taken from the latest reports received at the office of the adjutant and inspector of the army; to which is subjoined a list of resignations, dismissals, and deaths, of officers of the army, since the 1st of January, 1809.

The additional force ordered for the defence of New Orleans, was detached from the several corps as they had been recruited, and arrived at that place between the tenth of March and 20th of April, 1809. Leaving a detachment in the city of New Orleans, this army moved and encamped at Terre au Bœuf, on the Mississippi, fifteen miles below New Orleans, on the eighth of June, where they remained until the month of September. In September they embarked for Natchez, and in the month of October encamped near Washington, six miles in the rear of Natchez, at which place they huted for the winter.

It must have been expected, that the sickness and mortality incident to new troops in the summer and autumnal months, would be aggravated by their removal to a more southern climate. The whole of this detachment has been affected with disease; and the number of deaths will be found eventually to exceed those stated in the returns.

Since their removal to their present station, the latest advices state that they are convalescent.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

ARMORY AND ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, ON THE 28TH OF FEBRUARY, 1810.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 27, 1810.

In obedience to a resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives, of the 25th January, the Secretary of War has the honor to report:

That the public armory and arsenal, at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts, have been recently inspected, by an officer selected for that duty, who was directed to make strict and particular examination into the quality of the muskets manufactured at that place.

From the report of this officer, on whose judgment and fidelity reliance is placed, it appears that, in the early stages of that manufactory, muskets of an inferior quality were made; that improvements have been gradually making; and that those manufactured within the last year are of superior quality.

From the statement made by this officer, and from an inspection made by himself, in the summer past, the Secretary of War is of opinion, that the muskets manufactured at this time are of good quality, and that the public works at Springfield are well conducted.

All which is respectfully submitted.

W. EUSTIS.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

[2d SESSION.]

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 6, 1810.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President, as relates to an effectual organization of the militia of the United States, reported:

That, in considering the subject submitted to them, impediments of various and insuperable kinds presented themselves to view. The constitution of the United States gives to Congress only a qualified agency on the subject of the militia, and authorizes them only "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." As, under this provision, no authority is delegated to Congress to regulate fines for non-attendance, nor to fix the days for training, the only efficient means seem to be wanting to give force and skill to this establishment. The act of 1793 already provides for organizing and disciplining the militia; and a subsequent act makes provision for arming them. All, therefore, within the power of Congress, seems to have been already done, unless it should be deemed expedient to make a new organization, by a classification which shall constitute a select and a reserve militia.

The prejudices against such a mode of organization in many parts of the Union, and the difficulties to be surmounted, at a moment like the present, have deterred the committee from submitting such a project.

If the States are anxious for an effective militia, to them belong the power, and to them too belong the means of rendering the militia truly our bulwark in war, and our safeguard in peace; and as the committee are willing to hope that the States will not be unmindful of the great duty of providing for the national safety by a well ordered and effective militia, and as the committee are unwilling to derive any powers to Congress, not expressly given by the constitution, nor necessarily incident to the powers delegated, they submit the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from further consideration of this subject.

DEFECTS IN THE QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 12, 1810.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 1st, 1810.

SIR:

The inconveniences and embarrassments to the service, together with the neglect and loss of property, arising from the irregular and unprecedented manner in which the Quartermaster's Department is conducted, render it my duty to suggest the propriety of some further legal provision on the subject. The defects of the present system originate in the laws. By the law fixing the military peace establishment, provision is made for the appointment of three Military Agents, and as many Assistant Military Agents, not exceeding one to each military post, as the President shall deem expedient. The law authorizing an additional military force, provides for two Brigade and eight Regimental Quartermasters. The Military Agents and Assistant Military Agents are appointed by the President. The Brigade Quartermasters by the Brigadiers, and the Regimental Quartermasters by the Colonels of regiments.

The result of this organization is, that the Assistant Military Agents, who ought to account for, and make returns to, the Military Agents, of all property delivered to them, are not held by a proper responsibility, the Military Agents having no power or influence in their appointment, nor authority to call them to account for mal-practices or neglect of duty. The Brigade and Regimental Quartermasters are as little under their control.

It will also be perceived that no provision is made for the appointment of an officer whose duty it should be to have charge of, and be responsible for, the property appertaining to that department, to regulate and superintend the distribution of all supplies, and to whom all subordinate officers should be accountable.

In want of such an officer, the Secretary of War has been obliged to perform the duties of Quartermaster General. Under the military peace establishment, those duties were laborious. Since raising the additional military force, they have necessarily increased, until it is suggested by experience that, if they were compatible with other duties required of him, the Secretary of War cannot continue to discharge them, either satisfactorily to himself, or with justice to the public.

It is, therefore, respectfully suggested, that the President be authorized by law to appoint a Quartermaster General, with rank in the army not exceeding the rank of _____, with pay and emoluments not exceeding those of _____.

An Assistant Quartermaster General, to be taken from the line of Captains, whose compensation shall not exceed one half his monthly pay and emoluments.

As many Deputy Quartermasters General, not exceeding four, as the service may require.

If taken from the line, their compensation not to exceed one half their monthly pay and emoluments; if not of the line, not to exceed the present compensation of the Military Agents.

As many Assistant Deputy Quartermasters, not exceeding one to each military post, as the service may require, to be taken from the line, and allowed eight dollars per month, (as provided by law for the present Assistant Military Agents.)

Under this arrangement the Deputy Quartermasters General would perform the duties at present performed by the Military Agents: the Assistant Deputy Quartermasters, those performed by the Assistant Military Agents: Their compensation being the same, the additional expense to be incurred will consist principally in the pay and emoluments of the Quartermaster General, with the incidental expenses of his office, and in one additional Deputy Quartermaster General, if the service should require his appointment.

In time of peace, the proposed system being less complicated, and possessing a more regular and rigid accountability, would be far less expensive in its consequences: at the same time that it would instruct the officers in a branch of service acknowledged by military men to be of the first importance.

To meet a state of war without such an establishment, which has been justly denominated the right hand of an army, would be to disregard the practice and experience of our own and every other nation, and expose to hazard and defeat every military operation.

With respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Hon. W. B. GILES, Chairman.

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, January 13, 1810.

SIR:

In obedience to the instructions of the committee of the Senate, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 3d instant, I now have the honor of requesting you to submit a plan to the committee for establishing a General Staff, or Quartermaster's Department, for the Army of the United States. I am also instructed to intimate to you, sir, that it would be agreeable to the committee to have the plan as much in detail as your convenience will permit.

I have it also in charge from the committee, to ask of you a statement of military munitions, which may be required by the present exigencies of the country; together with an estimate of the sum of money which may be necessary for providing the same.

Be pleased, sir, to accept assurances of my high consideration, &c.

WM. B. GILES, Chairman.

The Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, January 15, 1810.

SIR:

Your favor of the 1st instant, respecting the establishment of a Quartermaster's Department for the Army of the United States, addressed to me, as chairman of a committee of the Senate, &c. was not put into my hands until late last evening.

It is probable, if it had been sooner received, a part of my letter of the 13th instant, addressed to you in relation to that subject, might have been deemed unnecessary by the committee.

Be pleased, sir, to accept my respectful compliments, &c.

WM. B. GILES.

The Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1810.

SIR:

I take the liberty of submitting for perusal and consideration, the enclosed extracts from the letters of Mr. William Linnard, (a faithful and indefatigable Military Agent) which letters were accompanied with the names of several Assistant Military Agents to whom he had made disbursements, and from whom he had not been able to procure satisfactory statements and settlements.

They are among the evidences daily occurring which evince the necessity of a reformation in the Quartermaster's Department.

With respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Hon. W. B. GILES, Chairman Committee of the Senate.

Extract of a letter from William Linnard, Military Agent, dated

PHILADELPHIA, September 15th, 1809.

"With respect to instructing the assistant agents to forward requisitions and other evidence, to show on what authority expenditures have been made, I beg leave to observe, that, whenever I have had occasion to write to a newly appointed agent, I have never failed to inform him that such documents were indispensably necessary to accompany their vouchers; and although I have been very particular in those instructions, little or no regard has been paid to them; and, in fact, in some instances, where the commanding officer was assistant agent, they have ridiculed the idea as extremely absurd to make requisitions on themselves. I do believe it to be impracticable to obtain those documents in every instance, unless the assistant agents were more stationary, and the principals clothed with more authority than they possess. I shall, however, not lose sight of the object, but continue to use my endeavors to obtain them; and, if I fail, it ought not to add to my duties, already too much multiplied."

Extract of a letter from William Linnard, Military Agent, dated

PHILADELPHIA, December 7th, 1809.

"On receipt of your instructions relative to the accounts, I wrote circular letters to all the assistant agents, and in order to enforce your injunctions, and that I might not be misunderstood, I enclosed copies of your instructions to me. To press the necessity of a particular attention to the vouchers, I introduced the following quotation from your letter: 'That, in all their disbursements, the authority of the commanding officer should accompany the voucher, particularly stating the object of the expenditure.' Some of the assistant agents and officers have strangely construed those expressions to require the authority the commanding officer had to make the requisition; and instead of writing to me for an explanation, they have delayed their accounts until the commanding officer could write to the Secretary of War for his authority, or an explanation."

WASHINGTON CITY, November 29th, 1809.

SIR:

On the eve of leaving the army, (unless a prospect of active service should forbid it) permit me to address you on the important necessity of the Quartermaster's Department being restored, if it was only on the ground of economy; for, to that department, belongs the care of all stores belonging to the army. By the derangement of that department, were strict inquiry made, it would be found that more than 100,000 dollars have been lost, in the course of a few years, by the abolition of the Quartermaster's Department, and the introduction of a system of military agency. Instances may be found of characters being employed as agents, perfectly ignorant of military affairs, and the great duties imposed on them, and at times unsupplied with the means necessary of performance.

The Quartermaster General of an army is an officer of great importance, and should be of high rank, active, persevering, and experienced, perfectly acquainted with the geographical situation and advantages of the country in which an army is to act, so as always to draw his supplies at the least possible injury and expense. He is primarily charged with all the articles belonging to his department; on him requisitions are to be made by the division quartermasters for such stores as may be required for their divisions; which stores are to be issued on the returns of the brigade quartermasters, and so to the regimental quartermasters, who are to make and deliver returns of all stores on hands and delivered once in three months, to the brigade quartermasters, who will consolidate and transmit them to the division quartermasters, who, in like manner, are to consolidate and transmit them to the Quartermaster General, who will transmit them to the Secretary of War. Pursuing this principle it can always be ascertained in what division, brigade, or regiment, there may be delinquency.

You will please excuse the liberty I have taken in addressing you on a subject of great importance to the army, either on a peace or war establishment. The importance of this subject will perhaps be more fully impressed by an application to military gentlemen who have experienced the inadequacy of the present system to the general welfare of our country.

Accept the assurances of my perfect esteem.

A. PARKER, Col. 5th Infantry.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 20, 1810.

SIR:

In answer to your letter of the 13th instant, requesting "a statement of military munitions which may be required by the present exigencies of the country, with an estimate of the sums which may be necessary for providing the same," I must ask the indulgence of the honorable committee in stating to them, that, as the sums already appropriated by law, for completing the fortifications for the defence of the ports and harbors, which had been commenced or projected, were deemed sufficient for the object, no further appropriation on account of fortifications was proposed in the estimate for the present year. But, in case of war, additional works will be required. Their situation, nature, and extent, depending on the emergencies which may require them, cannot be ascertained. In many instances, they will probably be of a temporary nature, and constructed principally by the troops.

The island of Rhode Island, from the peculiarity of its local situation, bordering on the ocean, accessible at all seasons of the year, affording a safe and commodious harbor, fertile in itself, commanding other islands, well stocked with provisions, and as a central station from which to harass the trade of the continent, offers to an enemy advantages not combined in any other port, and requires additional means of defence.

To meet the expenditures required at this and other places, it is therefore respectfully suggested that the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be appropriated on account of fortifications.

For supplying the several works with additional cannon, ammunition, and implements; for mounting on travelling carriages, with proper equipments, a train of heavy ordnance, for the defence of such points or places as are not protected by batteries; to mount and equip a train of field artillery; to provide arsenals for the deposit of small arms and artillery, with laboratories for preparing ammunition; and for procuring additional supplies of sulphur and saltpetre and other articles in the ordnance department, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars will be required.

The purchase of knapsacks, cartridge boxes, scabbards, belts, and other equipments for infantry and cavalry, of tents and other articles in the Quartermaster's department, with suitable store houses for their preservation, may be estimated at four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The munitions embraced in the foregoing estimates are considered as preparatory, requiring time to provide them, and admitting of such extension and additions as exigencies may require.

For future supplies of cannon, with their implements, of small arms and accoutrements, and of clothing, if suitable encouragement was given, great reliance may be placed on the public and private armories, and on the foundries and manufactories already in operation, the crude materials being the growth and produce of our own country.

Should the public exigencies render it necessary to call into actual service an additional military force, provision should be made in season for furnishing each non-commissioned officer and private with clothing for one year.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Hon. W. B. GILES, Chairman.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1810.

SIR:

The precarious state of foreign commerce, together with other considerations equally important, renders it extremely desirable that provision should be made for clothing the army of the United States from our own manufactories.

On the contracts for provisions made annually by this Department, and on other contracts requiring a large capital, it has been customary to make advances of money in order to enable the contractors to fulfil their engagements.

An extension of this practice to supplies of clothing would enable the purveyor to publish proposals and make his contracts in the same manner as the provision contracts are made. From the encouragement which would thus be given to the several manufactories, a spirit of competition would be excited, improvements would be made in the works and in the several fabrics, and there can be no doubt that ample supplies would be offered, on terms equally advantageous with those attending imported cloths, while the necessity of having recourse to importations in future would be finally removed.

In order to ensure success to this desirable object, it will be necessary that the appropriation for clothing should be made in the year preceding that in which the clothing is to be delivered.

I have thought the subject of sufficient importance to be communicated to the honorable committee of which you are chairman,

And am, with respectful consideration, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Hon. W. B. GILES, Chairman.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 16, 1810.

W. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

11th CONGRESS.]

No. 98.

[2d Session.]

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 29, 1810.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the message of the President as relates to the organization of the militia of the United States, reported "That the committee, in considering the several subjects to them referred, are of opinion, that it would be improper, at this time, to innovate on the present system of organization of the militia of the United States."

WASHINGTON, December 18th, 1809.

SIR:

The organization of the militia of the United States has long been deemed a subject of primary importance by those who have been conversant with public affairs. Various systems have been proposed and rejected, and, indeed, it is not an easy matter to make any regulation which shall be adapted to the laws and the habits of the different States. Being a member of the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to the organization of the militia of the United States, I take the liberty to inquire of you, what are the prominent defects of the present system. The act of Congress under which the militia are formed, was passed on the 8th of May, 1792, and must be perfectly familiar to you. By conversing with gentlemen from different parts of the United States, I find that all the Governors have not given that law the same construction: for instance, in the formation of corps of horse, artillery, light infantry, and grenadiers, in some States, the Executive authority has supposed that the act of Congress aforesaid, authorized the formation only of troops and companies; while in other States, regiments and even brigades are formed, and the officers have been duly commissioned.

A question hence arises, whether the orders of such general and field officers would be obeyed by officers from those States where no such system had obtained, if they should be called into service together. What has been the practice in this respect in your State? How are your dragoon and artillery corps formed; whether into troops and companies only, or into regiments and brigades, and if into the latter, under the sanction of what law?

Would it not be advisable, for the sake of uniformity, either to authorize by law the formation of regiments, especially of dragoons, or else to reduce the regiments now formed and attach one troop to each regiment or brigade of infantry.

In some States it has become a practice to obtain commissions, and resign them immediately, only for the sake of being exempt from militia duty. What inconvenience would result from limiting the shortest period of service to a commissioned officer, (extraordinary cases excepted) and if he should resign before the expiration of that period, to be liable to be called into the ranks? This is now the case in some States.

What are the objections to embodying a corps, to be composed of all such able bodied men as have reached the age of 45, and under 60, and who are exempt from military duty, only by age, under the present law, to be called the alarm list, and never liable to march out of the State, nor to perform military duty or parade; but to be obliged once a year to appear on parade armed, and, in case of invasion, or insurrection, to march with the other militia?

It has been a favorite theme, with the Southern members, to class the militia so as that the burthen of active duty, if needed, should fall on that portion of our citizens who are between twenty-one and twenty-five years of age. The Northern members have pretty uniformly opposed such an innovation upon our system. What objections to such a measure have occurred to your mind?

Would it be advisable for the General Government to attempt to arm the militia? and if so, in what mode? whether by giving them the arms, or to apportion them to the States, to be preserved in magazines against time of need?

Is there any thing, in the present mode of discipline, which needs the interference of the General Government? Would it be advisable to call out any portion of the militia yearly, to take the field? and if so, on what principles should such a system be adopted?

These, sir, are some of the prominent points on which, perhaps, some amendments may be made to our present militia system. Other improvements may undoubtedly have occurred to your mind. Any reflections which you may please to bestow upon this subject, and any amendments which you may propose to our present system, if communicated to me, shall be submitted to the committee who now have this subject under consideration.

This letter will be enclosed to Governor Treadwell, that he may make any remarks, or communicate such instructions to you, as he may deem necessary.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

General E. HUNTINGTON.

BENJ. TALLMADGE.

NORWICH, 5th January, 1810.

DEAR SIR:

In answering your letter of the 18th ultimo, which came to hand on the 29th, I find a task which, on opening and reading, I did not anticipate; but if, in the course of it, I shall give you one new idea worth preserving, I shall be more than satisfied.

The subject matter has frequently presented itself to my mind as attended with serious difficulty, as well as of great national importance; but, owing to the diversity of habits which are to be included, and probably in many respects, subdued, by a militia system pervading the United States, (without any knowledge of the respective State systems to which the men have been accustomed) I feel myself inadequate to form a plan which would be acceptable. Indeed I frankly own I have never seen any system proposed, in which I had confidence, nor do I believe any system, commensurate to the object, will ever be adopted by the Government, or, if adopted, be submitted to by the sovereign people. A man possessing so little confidence in militia to oppose regular troops, except for the moment, and on the spur of the occasion, and who absolutely knows, so fully as I do, the enormous waste and expense attending their every movement, is not capable of affording much aid in the completion of a militia system. Too much has already been done with the militia, if they are not to be a substitute for standing troops, and too little will always be done if they are made a substitute. The song which has been incessantly sung, ever since the constitution was adopted, that the militia are the sure bulwark of our nation, the safe guardians of our liberties, is now in the mouth of every one, and he who doubts the truth of it is deemed a political infidel; yet, with all the odium attached, I acknowledge myself no convert to such doctrine. Let the Government proceed to regulate the militia to the utmost length their masters, the sovereign people, will bear—it will be just so far as to make them fond for powder in the day of battle; and death, or what is worse, loss of honor, must be expected by every officer of spirit connected with them. General Knox's system (a copy of which he was pleased to send me) is the only system which I have seen, that can be considered as possessing any efficiency.

That system was rejected by the Government as being too expensive; it was approaching the mark, but, in my opinion, short, and not altogether correct in detail. Less energy than what that system contained is a downright fraud on the public mind. You observe that all the Governors have not given the act of Congress of 1792 the same construction in the formation of cavalry, &c. I reply that the act of 1792 was laid before the Legislature of this State, and a law passed to carry the same into effect, but some things to be effected, which the Legislature could not conveniently do, were submitted to his Excellency Governor Huntington, the then chief magistrate, to execute: among those referred, was the arrangement of the cavalry, which then consisted, if I recollect, of twenty-nine companies or troops, unequally divided into five or six regiments, one regiment containing seven companies. His Excellency the Governor, knowing that some of the troops had been raised under the immediate patronage of particular officers, and whose limits were not recorded in the office of the Secretary of State, though the officers had been commissioned, and the companies recognised by the Government, deemed it expedient to call to his counsel the general officers throughout the State; and when met, it was discovered that an uniformity of opinion did not prevail respecting retaining the cavalry in regiments. A majority of the gentlemen, however, considering the privileges which had been granted in raising the companies of cavalry, with the custom and usage of being regimented, brought the corps within the letter and spirit of the 3d section, and of the last clause of the 10th section of the law of 1792, and recommended that the cavalry should be formed into eight regiments, one of which to be attached to each brigade, and that his Excellency the Governor be requested to grant permission to raise three more companies to complete the eight regiments to four troops each. (The above detailed account I believe correct; I give it from recollection, and it is possible that, in some respects, my recollection may not have served me.) His Excellency, in conformity to such advice, did alter and new form the limits of the regiments of cavalry, did raise three more companies, and completed the eight regiments, and assigned them to the respective brigades of infantry. I cannot conceive that any collision can possibly arise respecting rank in any one State, among the cavalry officers; for the commissions issuing from the same source are of equal validity in the eyes of the officers; but it is possible, if the before mentioned exposition of the law is not correct, that collisions may arise when portions of militia from different States are called into the field together. The power of forming artillery companies is, by law, placed under the direction of the Captain General of this State; such companies as were in existence at the time of passing the act of 1792, with such as have been since raised, have been attached to the regiments of infantry from whence they enlisted.

Whether it is advisable to have the cavalry in regiments, or only in companies attached to infantry regiments, or what relative proportion is best, I cannot determine. The number of cavalry which might be employed to advantage in the Southern or Middle States, would, in a great degree, be useless in the New England States. For a sudden irruption into an enemy's country, or in a retreat, cavalry have a decided superiority over infantry, and if you could have them disciplined and instructed in the duties of an artillerist, they would become highly useful to operate with the artillery; but, under any general law for the government of the militia, I cannot persuade myself that they could be useful but in small numbers to clear a tract of country before an invading foe.

In an army where you can provide magazines, you can have large bodies of cavalry, but, in case of invasion, infantry, principally, are more to be relied on than large bodies of cavalry—they cannot be supported. I think the officers, commanding in the higher grades in the cavalry, require experience, and that experience which can be obtained only by serving with cavalry. Although you may frequently find an officer in the infantry, who would command a body of cavalry with honor to himself, still I believe that you must have your field officers used to, and familiar with, the cavalry discipline, which is not expected from an infantry officer. In this place, I would suggest, that the enormous expense of cavalry ought to have its influence to lessen its number. I am decidedly of opinion, that one company of cavalry to a brigade of infantry is a large proportion. If the number of cavalry were diminished to one company to a brigade of infantry, you might, with propriety, expect your men better mounted and equipped, and, in fact, be more efficient than a larger number. You might require the men to be of a certain size, of a certain age, and hold themselves owners of the horses, which horses should be inspected, accepted, and registered, and not borrowed, on a muster day, as, at present, is very common. The men might be enlisted under an express condition that they should always hold themselves liable to march, completely equipped and mounted, on the earliest notice. You well know that a great proportion of the horses used at present in our cavalry corps are totally unfit for field service.

You mention that, in some States, it is not unfrequent to accept commissions, and then resign, merely accepting the appointment to avoid service. The observation applies to every State, I presume, in a greater or less degree, and must always be expected, where the profession of arms is so little encouraged as in the United States, and where the honor of serving his country is held in so cheap estimation.

The length of time which an officer ought to serve, to entitle him to an honorable discharge, is difficult to ascertain; but I think if an officer was obliged to do duty in the ranks, who should not serve four years in the commission or grade from which he wished a discharge, it would be the mean of bringing forward a class of men, better calculated to do the public justice, than permitting so easy an evasion of military duty; perhaps, if above — years of age, and under — years of age, he might have his election, whether to pay an annual sum to the regimental purse, rather than be subjected to do duty in the ranks, would be desirable. Ought not the act of Congress to define exemptions from military duty, and the States be permitted to add none to that number, except the persons exempted be liable to an annual composition in money, to be paid into the military chest, for supplying the regiment with blank cartridges, colors, drums, fife, &c., and for any use to which an expense now arises to the regiment.

The experience which this State had of alarm list companies, as they were called, during the revolutionary war, which were composed of those exempt from military duty in the common militia companies, and, I think, under seventy years of age, has induced me to reject the idea of such men being embodied as soldiers; they may be useful as men, with their families, and some few of them may be employed about an army, but as soldiers they are not worth their rations. The sparsely settled state of our country, even in Connecticut, throws obstacles in the way of classing the militia, which have much weight in my mind; a great part of this State spreads the limits of a military company over an extended district of nearly nine miles in circumference, to obtain sixty-four, liable by law to do military duty, and many of the companies embrace a district of double that extent; which company, if brought into classes, would live so remote from a common centre, that the duties on ordinary trainings would be an unreasonable tax on the men, as a large proportion of those liable to do duty are of that class who neither own horses, nor are able to hire on such occasions. To avoid that inconvenience you must have small companies, and the whole worth of the company would be inadequate to furnish officers and non-commissioned officers. If ever classing of the militia should be thought essential, or a substitute must be found, I should prefer that every battalion should be obliged to have its flank company kept full, and that the flank companies, the artillery companies, and the cavalry, should have some incitements from the public treasury, to be in complete readiness on any and every emergency, and should be called for in the first instance, and without any previous notice, leaving to the Adjutants General to detail from the militia such a number of field and staff officers as to completely officer them, which detailed field and staff should be considered under requisitions for a certain length of time, and, if not called into the field in twelve months, then other officers to be detailed for the same duty and relieve them; and, if called into the field, to be relieved, on returning, after the tour of duty was performed. Such a corps, as abovementioned, would be more efficient than double their numbers, detached in the usual manner; it would take from this State about six thousand men, officers included, which is nearly our proportion of two hundred thousand men from the United States, making the last detail by the Secretary of War our guide. In respect to arming the militia by the General Government, I cannot believe it expedient in any point of view. If the public should be willing to place their arms in the hands of the soldiery, they would, under every care which would be taken, be nearly rendered useless in a very short period. If they should be placed under the care of the officers, they would soon be destroyed with rust, without a regular armorer to take care of them; if they should be put into the hands of the men on their responsibility, they would be sold by them in many instances, and loaned; and used for gunning in others, and, I have no doubt might be considered a total loss in five years; besides, if the public were to furnish arms for the militia, the arms, now in our country, and many of them very fine pieces, would be totally neglected, which are now kept in some kind of order by the owners, while they are impressed with the necessity of taking care of their property, and that, possibly, they may be called to take the field, and hazard their lives on the goodness of their arms. I should consider a magazine in each State, supplied with field pieces, arms, ammunition, and all the equipments necessary for a thousand men, and under the care of a suitable man paid for the purpose, more to be relied on than a supply for three thousand, dealt out to the men, or placed under the care of militia officers, at the close of every training day. If our liberties are worth preserving, and we will not pay enlisted troops to preserve them, we must be willing to pay a little out of the common stock, to support a system which is relied on as a substitute. I have no confidence in the mode of detaching the militia, as heretofore practised by our Government; I presume it has been calculated for its effect abroad, but you may rest assured its effects have been confined to ourselves—we have been imposed on—we have relied on the militia; without this detachment we should have considered ourselves neglected, but I firmly believe our country hath obtained, by the different detachments, nothing but the expense. You cannot find an European officer, and but few American officers, who hold the militia in much estimation; they do not respect them, only as they hold an enemy in bay for a moment, until other troops may be called in.

It is our parsimony which makes us too highly estimate militia; if the militia were more expensive than enlisted troops, there is not an American but would reprobate the idea. Having remarked on each of the points mentioned in your letter, I shall take the liberty to remark on the act of 1792, the consideration of which gave rise to your letter.

The first section, which respects enrolling the inhabitants, I wish to see altered in such a manner as to embrace all above the age of sixteen and under forty years of age. The experience I had, in the year 1777, of the exertions of our light infantry company, which was composed generally of lads under eighteen, and some under sixteen, satisfied me fully that, for nearly all and every service, the lads at sixteen were as much to be relied on as those above that age. On the approach of action they were always in spirits, calculating on the honor they should acquire. I had rather risk my reputation on the exertions by the class of young men, from sixteen to twenty, than on all those above that age. The young court danger from motives of honor and love of country combined; the elder class, on the approach of danger, are ruminating on their wives and children; the bodily strength of those of sixteen is equal to all the duties ordinarily required to be performed by the militia; they will be more ambitious in their acquiring the use of arms, and laying the foundation for promotion, which those with families, and more advanced in life, hold in much less estimation. In our Northern States, our military days of parade are generally considered holidays, and the class of citizens from sixteen to eighteen, are always found about the parade, and their amusements as laborious as the duties of a soldier, and frequently more injurious to their health and morals. By embodying all able bodied from sixteen to eighteen, will, in this State, I presume, add one-fifth, if not one third, to the number of militia.

I think the notice of six months to be equipped ought to be given, before the person arrives at the age of sixteen, so as to be obliged to do duty at that time; and I humbly conceive, that, if the law required no notice to be given by the officer enrolling, it would not be a hardship: for it is universally known by the boys among us when they are to be enrolled for duty. I am not very tenacious of that part of the law which requires the men to furnish themselves, and carry their ammunition to the field; if, on an emergency, they could receive ammunition from some common stock, more reliance could be placed on their being properly furnished, than in the present mode. I think no exemptions ought to be made from militia duty, but by act of Congress, and that such list of exemptions ought not to embrace so large a class of citizens as at present. By so many exemptions, the militia duty is rendered less popular, and the exemptions are frequently those very characters who would make the best officers. Every man whose public duty will permit him to do military duty, and is under forty years of age, I could wish to see become a citizen soldier, whilst the defence of our country is entrusted to the militia. If you will consent to embody those citizens from sixteen to eighteen, I firmly believe you may enlarge your companies to one hundred, without extending their limits, and I can see no inconvenience resulting from such an enlargement; it will excite more emulation among the officers. I think brigade majors should uniformly be taken from the line of Captains, and should have no additional rank thereby; all other staff officers, for the brigades or regiments, should be taken from the commissioned officers; indeed, I would allow no staff officer, except aides-de-camp, and the adjutant and quartermaster general, and their staff and hospital officers, to be taken from those not liable to military duty, and I would restrain the appointment of surgeons and surgeons' mates to regular bred licensed physicians and surgeons, and to those above years of age. It is highly exceptionable, in my view, to have such appointments made from favoritism; I have known some appointments to those important offices, made from boys under eighteen years of age, whom I would not have entrusted to open a vein, or extract a tooth. It is worse than murder to employ and depend on such creatures to attend the sick and wounded defenders of their country, when called to the field.

Instead of the uniform in any instance to be regulated by the brigadiers, as in the third section, I would have it established by Congress, that, when the militia of the different States are called to perform service together, they may be in uniform.

If the uniform should be established by Congress, to take place at a short future period, I have no doubt the troops would be completely clad in the course of two years, if not in one, and, having one fixed uniform, would be attended with economy. The State and regimental colors, mentioned in the fifth section, I would have provided from the funds of the regiment, into which, as a fund, I would have paid all fines collected for absence on days of muster or review, and the sums paid for exemptions from military duty before suggested, and all other fines; and I think, whenever a regiment is under arms, the Colonel or commanding officer should possess power to inflict fines on those who absent themselves, after the muster has commenced, or for improper conduct, to the amount of — dollars. Confinement on such a day is not a pleasant mode to be adopted, with some of those liable to do duty, whose feelings are not alive to such punishment, but would feel the effects of a fine; it should be left optional with the commandant to fine, confine, or both. To the duties of an adjutant general in each State, I would annex the duties of inspector general, and make it his duty personally to inspect the troops, (taking to his aid, whilst inspecting each brigade, the brigade majors of such brigades respectively.) He ought to examine every article, required by law to be part of the equipment, the ability of the horses belonging to the cavalry, and occasionally to exercise the troops, if he deems it expedient and necessary. To this officer, from whom I would require so much duty, I would have annexed a compensation, sufficient to call into such service suitable persons to perform the duty. I do not hazard any thing, in my opinion, when I say, that more can and will be effected by such an officer, to make your militia efficient, and be constantly in readiness for service, than from any other cause whatever. No provision is made by the law of 1792 for furnishing field artillery; I ask you whether it is the duty of the State to furnish pieces for their militia, when called out of the State? and whose duty it is to furnish horses to drag the artillery, when detached, and to find ammunition, &c. & whether the respective States would permit their brass pieces to be removed out of the State, without, or with, a provision for payment in case of losses? This subject may be worth consideration, and, if the pieces are damaged, whose duty is it to repair them? I think whenever a fine is placed on a man by a military tribunal, having cognizance of the crime, it should not be within another tribunal to re-examine and review; many of our officers neglect laying fines, more through fear of a law suit, than from a willingness to neglect their duty. I would have all fines, laid by the company officers, reported to the field officers, who should compose a court, to review and judge of the propriety of collection, or remitting, and their judgment should not be reviewed or reversed by any civil court. If a man, by his age, is liable to be enrolled in the first instance, (until he arrives at the age of exemption) he shall have no other tribunal, before whom he may bring his claim, but the board of field officers. If Congress should leave to the respective States to make exemptions, they ought to provide that the person who had been dismissed, or exempted from militia duty in his native State, or place of residence, for services which he had performed as an officer in the line or staff, should not be liable to be enrolled in another State, to which he may remove, provided he produces evidence of his former service and exemptions. A person who may have served as a staff officer in Connecticut, is, by the law of New York, liable to do duty in the ranks, if he moves into that State, which ought not to be the case. Courtesy dictates otherwise.

The manner of appointing officers to take command of the militia in this State, and, perhaps, in many other States, is a subject which I doubt whether the United States would think expedient to meddle with. It is one of those points respecting which advocates may be found for and against regulating the same; but, if it should be thought within the constitution, and expedient to meddle with the subject, a question will arise, whether the appointment of commissioned and non-commissioned officers to companies may not be placed in better hands than in the hands of the soldiers? But, as it is doubtful in my mind exactly where the constitution intended to limit the arrangement of the militia, by the word organize, and as taking the appointment of the officers and non-commissioned officers from the soldiers, is rather aristocratic and anti-republican, I will not extend my remarks on that subject. Permit me to suggest that the bestowment of rank by brevet, to persons not in the line, was a source of inconvenience in the Revolutionary war, and requires great caution and care. Having so largely remarked on the subject of the militia as I have done, you will permit me to observe, that I have not prepared the same for criticism; I have suggested my ideas with freedom to you as a friend, and in compliance with your request; I hope they will not be exposed to much inspection but by my friend. The gentlemen who compose the military committee are unknown to me, but presume they are strangers, and will not highly appreciate my remarks; but to you I submit them.

I am, with much esteem and respect, your obedient and very humble servant,

E. HUNTINGTON.

The Honorable BENJAMIN TALLEMADGE.

TRENTON, 29th December, 1809.

SIR:

I do not presume I can add to the information of an officer of your experience; it is, however, proper to pay respectful attention to the subject of the letter you did me the honor to write on the 20th (received the 26th) inst. You will therefore please accept of the following answers given to your questions, relative to the organization of the militia of the United States, as the result of my observations:

First. How are your dragoon and artillery corps formed?

Answer. Previous to the Western expedition, in 1794, the companies of cavalry and artillery, in New Jersey, were attached to the regiments within whose bounds they were formed.

Besides a brigade of upwards of 1,500 infantry, including two companies of artillery thereto attached, in requisition, 537 cavalry marched as volunteers to Pittsburg. Governor Howell appointed General White, then adjutant general of New Jersey, to the command of the cavalry, arranged in squadrons under the command of senior captains. The like formation into squadrons was made of the cavalry of Pennsylvania, by Governor Mifflin.

Upon the return of the cavalry to New Jersey, application was made to the Legislature, and by the militia law of New Jersey were formed into ten squadrons, making five regiments, and composed one brigade, under the command of a brigadier general, five lieutenant colonels, and ten majors, and have so continued.

The artillery of the State was also formed into two battalions, making one regiment, and officered accordingly. It was found absolutely necessary to organize such a body of cavalry as 500 into squadrons and regiments, for subordination and discipline.

It will therefore be advisable, as well for the sake of uniformity, throughout the United States, as for their better military regulation and discipline, to direct the organization of the cavalry in squadrons and regiments. It will be more satisfactory, where the cavalry have been thus organized, and prevent offence by their being reduced.

Second. What inconvenience would result from limiting the shortest period of service to a commissioned officer?

Answer. It would be an improvement of the militia law of the United States to restrain the resignation of officers, until they shall have served seven years, unless in cases of necessity; and after-service of seven years, to be exempted from service in the ranks, nevertheless, to be embodied and mustered with the senior class.

There are no exemptions in New Jersey but those exempted by the militia law of the United States. If an officer resigns, he must return to the ranks or be fined.

Third. What are the objections to embodying a corps of between the ages of forty-five and sixty?

Answer. There is no reasonable objection. The militia law of the United States ought to require the muster of all able bodied men, between the ages of forty-five and sixty, for review, properly armed, but not to perform military duty, only in case of invasion; nor to be required to march out of the State: to be denominated the Senior Corps, or Senior Class, of militia.

Permit me here to ask, what objections can be made to class minors, between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one?

These youths to put on their frocks, or other regimentals, and be exercised in their several towns, two hours before sunset, on the last Saturday in April, May, June, July, August, and September, under officers above the age of twenty-one.

Great complaints are made in New Jersey by parents and masters having their children and apprentices put in requisitions in many cases, inability to equip, pay fines, &c. which operates as a heavy tax on poor parents, and particularly on mechanics, who have from five to twenty apprentices. I wish to see such a corps well disciplined in their non-age.

There was some objection made to the enrolling of minors when this business of classification, between twenty-one and twenty-six, was before Congress, in 1806. Yet I have never heard of a constitutional objection against that part of the present militia law of the United States, which directs the enrolment of those who shall, from time to time, arrive at the age of eighteen years. And why not enrol minors of sixteen, as well as those of eighteen, &c. If it is unconstitutional in any of the States to enrol minors, what becomes of those between eighteen and twenty-one? If the objection arises from the constitution of any of the States, on account of the appointment of the officers to command minors, this can be accommodated in those States, by incorporating the minor with the senior class, and let the seniors exclusively elect the officers to command both classes.

There ought to be some amelioration made in favor of those between eighteen and twenty-one, as to the equipments, fines, penalties, and particularly on requisitions of the Government.

The Junior Corps, of course, will be those between twenty-one and forty-five, compose the great body and active militia force of the nation; be put in requisition as heretofore, to march out of the State, &c.; nor do I wish to see this corps paralyzed by the classification, of men between twenty-one and twenty-five, as has been proposed.

Fourth. What are your objections against classing the militia, so that the burthen of active duty shall fall on men between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-five years?

Answer. Doubts are entertained:

I. Whether this would not infringe the constitution of the United States, art. 1, sec. 8, page 16, "reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia," &c. And the article of amendment to the constitution of the United States, "a well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

Although I sincerely wish this reservation and amendment were stricken out of the constitution of the United States, yet, whilst they remain, no good, energetic, general, uniform, national system of organization, of the militia of the United States, can be effected. In the administration of President Adams, it was alleged that the act authorizing the President of the United States to raise a provisional army, passed 22d May, 1798, particularly section 3, and the supplementary act thereto of 22d June, 1798, were infringements of these articles of the constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it was unconstitutional—

1st. To separate a part of the militia within the State.

2d. Exempted these volunteer corps, whilst within the State, from the government of the militia laws of the State.

3d. The appointment of the officers by the President.

II. The impolicy of such a corps at this time:

1st. It would derange, at one stroke, the system of organization of the militia of the several States, adopted near eighteen years, under the militia law of the United States.

2d. It would annul, or operate as a repeal, of the several militia laws of the United States, passed in conformity to the law of the United States, of 8th May, 1793.

- 3d. It would require at least a year for the passing of the militia laws, in the several States, conforming to the proposed alteration, and perhaps some of the States would not concur.
- 4th. The extended residence of men, between twenty-one and twenty-six, in the country, will make their assembling, for exercise, &c. very burthensome and unequal with those in the cities and populous parts of the United States.
- 5th. The exercise under officers (as it must be) of their own choice will not improve these corps in military knowledge, better than the great body of the militia under the present system.
- 6th. It will be an insupportable expense to allow this select corps pay and rations.
- 7th. It will weaken the natural defence of the nation, composed of the great body of the people, by placing entire dependence on this select corps.
- 8th. In requisitions, substitutes are usually obtained of the poorer classes of men above twenty-six, and, indeed, many only "fit food for powder and ball." If these select corps are established, the nation cannot be purified of these gross materials above twenty-six.

If such corps should be selected, and separated from the militia, to allow them rations would be sufficient, to be exercised by their officers, under the direction and inspection of an inspector in each State, distinguished for military acquirements; to be paid by the United States.

Fifth. Would it be advisable for the Government to arm the militia?

Answer. That article of the constitution of the United States, respecting the militia, expressly directs, that Congress shall "provide for arming" the militia. They have not done it. The National Legislature have neglected what they ought have done the moment it was in their power, to have apportioned arms, accoutrements, &c. to the amount, at least, of one-sixth of the number of the enrolled militia; established arsenals for their preservation, with magazines of powder and ball, and camp equipage, &c. But, instead of doing this, Congress, by their militia law of 1792, order every citizen enrolled to provide himself with arms, &c. and in five years require all muskets to have bores sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound. The Legislatures of some of the States have passed militia laws directing this to be done. Seventeen years have elapsed, and it has not been effected, it is believed, by any State in the Union. In New Jersey, only one regiment have (from fines collected from the Quakers within its bounds) purchased six hundred stand of arms and accoutrements.

The supply of arms, ammunition, camp equipage, arsenals, &c. in every State ready for the militia, particularly for one-sixth thereof, being, perhaps, sufficient for any requisition of the United States, would give spirit and confidence to the great body of the militia.

The amendment of the constitution of the United States, cited, secures "the right of the people to keep and bear arms;" nor will the constitution of the United States, or the rights of the States, or of the people, be infringed, and I am very confident not endangered, if the concurrent authority of the National Government is exercised to provide arms, establish magazines, &c. and to arm indeed the great body of the militia of the United States.

Sixth. Would it be advisable to call out any portion of the militia, yearly, to take the field? and if so, on what principle would it be advisable to adopt such a system?

Answer. Before this can be done to any advantage, arms, accoutrements, tents, and camp equipage must be furnished by the Government of the United States; after the national Legislature shall have provided and delivered into the magazines established in every State, sufficient for a requisition of, say, 100,000 men, to be enrolled for three years' service, from the junior class of militia, that is, between twenty-one and forty-five, according to the quotas of the several States, who shall meet once a year in the vicinity of the arsenal, and perform, for fifteen days, all the duties incident to a camp, to be exercised by their officers, and inspected by their respective State adjutant general, who will perform similar duties to those prescribed in the sixth section of the militia law of the United States.

Neither officers or men to receive pay, but to be furnished with rations and clothing, of a frock, pantaloons, &c. from the magazines, to be returned on breaking up the camp, &c.

Seventh. What are the prominent defects of the present system?

Answer. The answer to this question has been, in a manner, anticipated by the observations already made, particularly respecting the neglect of the Government of the United States in not making provision to supply arms, tents, &c.; establishing magazines in the several States; for the making of militia laws, will not avail, without arms, ammunition, camp equipage, &c. ready to take the field.

Whether the classification of the senior and minor, or either of these corps, be adopted; that, in preference to the proposed select corps, between twenty-one and twenty-six, the junior corps of men, between eighteen and forty-five, or twenty-one and forty-five, be put in requisition, without discrimination, whenever a call is made by the Government.

The returns of militia being very incorrect, the quotas on the several States ought to be according to the representation in the House of Representatives in Congress.

I beg leave to suggest here, that the law to take the census provides for the enumeration of all males under sixteen; between sixteen and twenty-one; between twenty-one and forty-five; and between the ages of forty-five and sixty; and from sixty upwards; at any rate, of the number of males between eighteen and forty-five, if the present militia system shall be continued.

Sincerely wishing you health, and many returns of this season of joy and festivity,

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOSEPH BLOOMFIELD.

The Honorable Colonel B. TALLMADGE.

[2d SESSION.

MORTALITY IN THE TROOPS AT NEW ORLEANS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 27, 1810.

Mr. NEWTON, from the committee, in obedience to a resolution which passed the House of Representatives of the United States, on the thirteenth of March last, instructing them to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in the detachment of the army of the United States, ordered for the defence of New Orleans, submitted the following report:

The committee perceived, at the instant their attention was directed to the subject referred to them, its importance, difficulty, and extent. The solicitude which was expressed for the acquisition of accurate information, and the manner in which the inquiries of the committee were pointed to a specific object, stimulated them to fulfil, to the utmost of their power, the expectation and desire of the House. In performing the duties assigned to them, they necessarily had many difficulties to encounter; these consisted in collecting, collating, and arranging a multitude of facts and circumstances, which had their origin in a distant territory, and the dissimilar aspects in which the same object would be represented, according to the medium through which it had been seen. Not discouraged at the prospect of such labors, they proceeded to commence them with every disposition and with all the patience so essential to ensure a fair, candid, and impartial disclosure of the state of the detachment of the army ordered to New Orleans. To accomplish a purpose every way so desirable and interesting, and likewise to obviate objections, the committee, on mature deliberation and reflection, determined to make a plain and succinct statement of facts, as the method best calculated to impart information, and to guide the understanding in the formation of a current judgment.

In pursuing this plan, which the committee early laid down for their observance, they are led to present to the House, in a narrow compass, the correspondence which passed between the Department of War and the commanding officer.

Next in order, the number of troops sent to New Orleans, and the present effective force.

The measures taken for paying the troops, and the precautions observed for ensuring a prompt supply of sound and wholesome provisions for their subsistence.

The instructions given to the military agent by the Department of War, and the authority invested in the commanding officer over the military agent, as gathered from the instructions. Under this head will be included whatever relates to clothing and medical and hospital stores.

The depositions taken by the committee.

Lastly, the causes which, in the opinion of the committee, produced the mortality in that detachment of the army.

A No. 1.

A letter from the Secretary of War, dated February 24, 1810, in answer to one addressed to him in obedience to the direction of the committee, requesting information on the subject submitted to them.

The Secretary says, "I have the honor accordingly herewith to submit to their inspection a transcript of the original order, bearing date December 2, 1803, designating the force destined for the defence of New Orleans, and of the subsequent orders from this Department, together with such extracts from the letters of the commanding general as relate to the selection and occupancy of, and the removal of the troops from, the encampment at Terre au Bœuf."

A No. 2.

On the 2d of December, 1808, the Secretary of War, (General Henry Dearborn) in a letter to General James Wilkinson, says, "I am directed by the President of the United States to have the necessary measures taken, without delay, for assembling as large a proportion of our regular troops at New Orleans and its vicinity, as circumstances will permit." Immediately following this extract, the regiments and companies destined for New Orleans are designated, and the previous preparatory arrangements connected with the movements are directed to be made. The letter then concludes: "You will please to take measures for being at New Orleans in season to take command of the army in that department as early as practicable, and to have such a disposition of the troops in that department formed, as will most effectually enable you to defend New Orleans and its dependencies against any invading force. In case of emergency, you are authorized by the President of the United States to call on the Governors of the Orleans and Mississippi territories, for such detachments of the militia as may be deemed necessary."

On the 30th of April, 1809, the Secretary of War, (William Eustis, Esquire,) addressed a letter to General James Wilkinson, expressing great anxiety and solicitude for the health of the troops. Alive to apprehensions on this important point, he proceeds to say, "on inspecting the general instructions given by this Department, 2d of December, 1808, it appears that the troops were to be assembled at New Orleans: an apprehension that the letter of this instruction may be construed to limit any measures which your own judgment might suggest respecting a change of position, induces me to remove any such obstacle, if it shall have had an influence. By the returns of the 24th of March, it appears that more than one-fourth part of the troops were sick. Without a knowledge of this fact, the removal of the army from New Orleans, during the summer and autumnal months, is suggested by every consideration of prudence and experience. If, therefore, such removal shall not, on receipt of this letter, have been already commenced, you will be pleased to give the necessary orders to have it effected immediately. After leaving the necessary garrison, consisting of old troops, at New Orleans, it will be desirable that all the others should be transported either to the high ground in the rear of Fort Adams, or a part of them in the rear of the Natchez; perhaps both these stations should be occupied, a division of the troops being more favorable to their health than quartering the whole together in one body: of this you will judge. The primary object will be to preserve the health and lives of the men; next, to have them so quartered as will best admit of a regular system of order, government, and discipline, with as much economy as is practicable."

On the 29th of May, 1809, General James Wilkinson addressed a letter to the Secretary of War. He says, "after much inquiry, I have determined on a spot for the encampment of the troops. It was a difficult matter, from the localities of the country, to adjust; and being an object of primary importance in relation to economy, discipline, and health, it has truly occupied all my cares and attentions, and will, I hope, be my excuse for inattention to minor objects." In the part immediately succeeding this extract, the General mentions that he had abandoned the idea of encamping on the site spoken of by General Henry Dearborn, called Galvestown, on the Amite river, on account of its being the most sickly spot in the territory. The General then says: "with the general voice of the Americans and Creoles in favor of it, I have selected a piece of ground on the left bank of the Mississippi, below this city about four leagues, which I find perfectly dry at this moment, although the surface of the river, restrained by its dykes, is in general three feet above the level of the country. You will put your finger on the spot at the head of the English Turn, just where the route to the settlements on the Terre au Bœuf leaves the river. The disadvantages of the position are private ground, private wood, and its vicinity to New Orleans. But its advantages are, promised health, the best water of the country, the accommodation and comforts of a market, the immediate protection of the city, and the prompt defence of the river and lakes against an invading force. Under such considerations, and the rapid advance of the season, I could pause no longer; but shall proceed to take the position, and make the necessary establishments for the reception and safe keeping of the stores and provisions, necessary to supply and support the troops, and for the comfortable lodgement of the sick and well."

Letter from General Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, June 18, 1809.

"Your letters of the 30th April, and 4th ultimo did not reach New Orleans until the last mail, the 14th instant, though we received at the same time the President's speech. I am happy that I have so far anticipated your wishes as to have encamped the troops, though I have not sought the position you recommended; nor should I have done so while permitted to exercise my discretion, and for the following reasons: The movement to Fort Adams or to Natchez must have been made by water, as the Spaniards will not permit our passage through West Florida: the toil, the time, and exposition to the sun, in ascending the river one hundred leagues, with a corps of two thousand, would probably have deceased nine-tenths of the men, many of whom were in a convalescent state, and as many sick." The General then states the expense of transportation; that the position is too remote for the seasonable protection of New Orleans against external attack or internal commotion; that the upper country might prove more sickly than the bank of the Mississippi; that the movement to Terre au Bœuf was made without inconvenience to the well, or injury to the sick, and at no expense, because the chalons which transported them will be employed in erecting the necessary temporary buildings, and for flooring the tents. The General further states, that the position taken is refreshed by sea breezes, and that although more than five hundred sick and convalescent were brought to the ground which had been previously occupied by five hundred and sixty men, from the 1st instant not more than three men died, and one of these of an apoplexy; that the morning reports of the 13th and 16th will exhibit a frightful return of the sick; "yet, says he, you are to understand that nine-tenths are strongly convalescent, and are returned sick to prevent their being detailed for the general fatigues, to which we are now, and shall be for some time to come, necessarily exposed." After mentioning that the safety of those who are entrusted to his charge impress him with an awful sense of responsibility, and will occupy all his attention, he proceeds to say: "It is a source of pleasurable reflection to me, that the aspects and accommodation of the position have prepossessed every man and officer in its favor. We have a good market of vegetables, milk, eggs, and fowls, from the settlements of Terre au Bœuf." He then speaks of arrangements in the sutling department; wishes to be advised whether it is the intention of Government to erect a cantonment, as one would be necessary, either at Natchez or Terre au Bœuf: if the latter, expenses of such establishment are set forth. He then says, "I submit these observations to you for your consideration, as it is my duty to aid your judgment, and shall be ready to execute the Presidential will."

The Secretary of War to General James Wilkinson, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1809.

Being unable to perceive any advantages in the position which you have selected for an encampment, as stated in your letter of the 29th of May, which give it a preference over the high ground in the rear of Fort Adams, or its vicinity, to which my letter of the 30th of April directed, conditionally, the removal of the troops, I am left to presume either that my letter has not been received, or that some causes unknown to me and reconcilable with the object stated in that letter have governed your decision. On receiving this letter you will be pleased immediately to embark all the troops, leaving a sufficient garrison of old troops at New Orleans and at Fort St. Philip, and proceed with them to the high ground in the rear of Fort Adams, and to the high ground in the rear of Natchez, (the public ground) and form encampments; dividing them equally, or in such proportions between the two places, as your own judgment shall direct. The enclosed copy of an order from the Navy Department will present you the means of transportation. The movement of the troops will be committed entirely to your direction."

By a letter bearing date Camp Terre au Bœuf, July 23d, 1809, General Wilkinson acknowledges that the preceding order had come to his hand: he says, "your duplicate of the 22d ultimo reached New Orleans by last mail on the 19th, and came to my hands on the night of the 20th, at ten o'clock: the original has not yet arrived. The peremptory tenor of your order for the removal of the troops has relieved me from an oppressive load of responsibility, and I have not lost a moment in entering on the execution." He states the impossibility of controlling the effects of the climate; that it will be in vain to seek refuge from disease in that region, with unseasoned recruits. He also states, that, when possession was taken of the present healthful site at Columbia Springs, near Fort Adams, two hundred and forty-six men were down at one time out of about five hundred. After mentioning some things relating to the movement of the detachment up the river, he says, "you will discover, from my letter of the 18th ult., the causes which opposed our ascent of the river: the employment of the gun boats removes the expense, and the labor of the sailors will save that of the troops, but the tardiness of the movement and the heat of the sun in dog days must endanger our health."

After expressing his sense of the necessity of economy, and stating that the establishment had cost something, but that the cost will bear comparison with antecedent expenses, he then mentions that the public cost, in future, would not exceed six or eight hundred dollars per month, the year round, for every incidental expense, wood, pasturage, and quarters, included; and concludes thus: "under all circumstances, I must frankly say, that, was my discretion permitted, I should stay here and hazard the consequences; but as there would be hazard, I am glad of your order to move, not only as it lessens my responsibility, but because the change of place may prove salutary to our men; in all events you may depend on whatever my judgment, experience, personal exposition, and attention, can effect.

A No. 3.

The following letter, dated Camp, Terre au Bœuf, August 19, 1809, is addressed to the Secretary of War, by General Wilkinson: he says, "I have not received the scrip of a pen for you since the 30th of June, but am progressing rapidly in my arrangements for moving the troops, an object near my heart, and which occupies all my attentions."

The General then states, that not one of the gunboats had been reported in readiness; that the preparation was difficult, owing to the general sickness of their crews, and the impracticability of shipping men; that the condemned barges at Fort Adams had been ordered down, and were repairing at a small expense; that if the gun boats fail him, he should hire three or four barges, and that in twenty days he expected to make good his landing at Natchez, or in that vicinity. He then states, "our sick have increased considerably, but our maladies are confined almost universally to the ague and fever; nearly all the officers had it, but we have not lost one, nor do I expect we shall." He states the difficulties which occurred in the department of provisions: he says, "the clamors of the troops had been loud and just; that he had offered one hundred dollars for a small cow, without effect; that the flour was affected by the climate immediately after landing; and that, on the utter failure of the contractor to furnish bread or flour, for two or three days successively, he had purchased a hundred barrels of flour, and had the same distributed." He attributes to the absence of the contractor, and the consequent management of his business being entrusted to a young man, without knowledge or experience, and, apparently, of an obstinate, perverse disposition, all the difficulties they had to encounter on the subject of provisions. He then says, "I wish, indeed, that he may not oblige me to take the whole business out of his hands, and to appoint a commissary to purchase and supply; but, in the last extremity only, shall I resort to this step." After stating "that the inhabitants were down with the prevailing disease of the camp, a thing which, according to them, had never before occurred," he concludes thus: "I am alarmed for our medical and hospital expenses, but I do not understand that a particle of either has yet arrived for the new levies, and of course I have no alternative but to submit to the requisitions of the surgeons." We shall not, however, press your appropriations for this department, although the consumption of five or six hundred sick must be considerable."

PROVISIONS.

These are furnished by contract. By the second article of the contract for supplying provisions to the troops, it is provided, "that it shall be in the option of the general or officer commanding an army on a great military district, to direct when and how often fresh or salted meat shall be issued by general orders, to be promulgated a reasonable time before the issue is to commence."

By the fourth article, "whenever, in the opinion of the commanding officer, the provisions offered to be issued are unsound, unfit for use, or of an unmerchantable quality, a survey shall be held thereon by two disinterested persons, one to be chosen by the commanding officer, and the other by the contractor, or his agent; and, in case of disagreement, a third person, to be chosen by mutual consent, who shall have power to condemn such part of the provisions as to them may appear unfit for use." If the contractor, "or his agent, fail, or neglect to appoint a person to inspect the provisions, after reasonable notice in writing, the commanding officer may appoint such persons as he may think proper."

The fifth article authorizes the commanding general, "in case of absolute failure, or deficiency in quantity, of provisions contracted to be delivered and issued, to supply the deficiency by purchase, at the risk of the contractor." The power conferred by the last article was, in one instance, exercised. That those granted by the fourth and fifth articles were not exercised, can be accounted for, by this Department, on the presumption only, that, in the opinion of the general, the country could not furnish the supplies.

Instructions to the Military Agent at New Orleans, and amount of disbursements in that department.

The following instruction to A. D. Abrahams, the military agent at New Orleans, "to procure and deliver, on the orders of the commanding officer, such articles as he may deem necessary for the public service," was given by the Secretary of War, (Gen. Henry Dearborn) on the 12th of December, 1808.

L No. 2.

The Secretary of War, (William Eustis, Esq.) May 4, 1809, wrote to A. McCulloch, and informed him of his appointment as military agent, A. D. Abrahams having resigned. This letter contains many regulations for the agent's observance in executing the duties of his office. The abovementioned instruction is repeated, and the following additional one given: "The expenditures should be as economical as the good of the service will permit. No article, it is presumed, will be required of you, but such as the nature and good of the service actually demand. Should it happen, however, at any time, that demands are made upon you to a large amount, the propriety of complying with which you may doubt, and where delay may not, in your judgment, prove injurious to the public interest, you are to consult this Department." It appears Mr. McCulloch died in a few days after his arrival at New Orleans; on which Major Zebulon M. Pike, of the 6th regiment, was appointed, by Gen. Wilkinson, as successor to Mr. McCulloch, and continued to discharge the duties of that office under the instructions, given to Mr. McCulloch, until the removal of the troops from the encampment at Terre au Bœuf.

L Nos. 7 and 3.

The Secretary of War, in a letter addressed to the committee, bearing date the 16th of April, 1810, says, "Representation being made by the Accountant of this Department, that many articles in the accounts rendered by Mr. A. D. Abrahams, the military agent, were charged at extravagant prices, the necessity of some of which did not appear, and the prices of others being deemed exorbitant, the military agent was informed, on the 10th of August last, that he was not authorized to comply with such requisitions in future. This is the only limitation of the instructions beforementioned, which has been made by this Department." This last instruction to the military agent could not have reached him until some time in September last. The military agent, whenever he wanted funds, drew bills on the Department of War, which were regularly paid.

L Nos. 4, 5, and 6.

Disbursements in the Quartermaster and Medical and Hospital Departments, by A. D. Abrahams, Military Agent.

On account of that part of the army stationed at New Orleans, and in its vicinity, between the 1st of January and 20th of July, 1809, including payments made for the charter of a part of the vessel employed to transport the troops to that place.—See document K,	$55,188 43
Disbursements made by Major Pike, on same account, from 21st July to 31st of December, 1809,	27,474 73
	$82,663 16

NOTE. The above sums embrace no part of the expenditures made on the fortifications erecting at New Orleans.

William Linnard, military agent, at Philadelphia, in his letter of the 31st of March, 1810, states, that medical and hospital stores were shipped on board the schooner Hillsman; that she sailed from Philadelphia the 7th of January, 1809; was detained by ice; sailed again the 6th of March following, and arrived at New Orleans the 5th of April, and delivered the stores on the 7th and 8th.

M Nos. 1 and 2.

CLOTHING.

By the same letter from William Linnard, military agent, it appears, that the brig North Star sailed from Philadelphia the 6th of July, 1809, with clothing for the troops; arrived at New Orleans the 23d of August, and delivered the same in three days after her arrival; which was within twelve months of the time that the men of that detachment had generally received their clothing for the preceding year.

THE DEPOSITIONS.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12.

The committee, from a knowledge which they have acquired of the climate of New Orleans, and of the country surrounding it, and from the facts stated in the depositions, are of opinion, that the mortality in the detachment ordered to New Orleans is to be ascribed to the following causes:

1. The detachment consisting of new levies;
2. The insalubrity of the climate—the summer and autumn of the year 1809 being unusually sickly.
3. To the nature of the ground on which the detachment was encamped at Terre au Bœuf, and the detention of it at that place during the whole of the summer, contrary, as the committee conceive, to the instructions contained in the letter of the Secretary of War; bearing date the 30th of April, 1809.
4. To the want of sound and wholesome provisions and of vegetables; the want of an hospital, and hospital stores and medicines.
5. The excessive fatigues to which the troops were subjected in clearing, ditching, and draining, the ground on which they were encamped.
6. To the want of repose during the night, owing to the troops not being provided with bars or nets to protect them from the annoyance of musquitoes.
7. The want of cleanliness in the camp, the nature of the position rendering it almost impracticable to preserve it.
8. The sick and well being confined to the same tents, which neither protected them sufficiently from the heat of the sun, nor kept them dry from the dews and rains.

A No. 1.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 24, 1810.

SIR: In answering your letter of the 19th instant, requesting information on the following heads, viz:

- 1st. Whether the detachment from the army of the United States sent to New Orleans was encamped at Terre au Bœuf, on the Mississippi, in pursuance of orders given to the commanding officer of that detachment?
- 2d. The object of the encampment of that detachment at Terre au Bœuf?
- 3d. Whether the detachment during the encampment at Terre au Bœuf, suffered in any respect for want of regular and necessary supplies?
- 4th. Whether the detachment was encamped in contravention to orders: if in contravention to orders, the time it so continued at that place?

I have adopted the course which has appeared to me most becoming the occasion, and best calculated to convey to the honorable committee, of which you are chairman, the information they have requested. I have the honor, accordingly, herewith to submit to their inspection a transcript of the original order, bearing date December 2d, 1808, designating the force destined for the defence of New Orleans, and of the subsequent orders from this Department, together with such extracts from the letters of the commanding general as relate to the selection and occupancy of, and the removal of the troops from, the encampment at Terre au Bœuf.

Previous to the issuing of the order of the 22d of June, a consultation was had with the Secretary of the Navy, the result of which justified an expectation that the necessary transports for the troops might be derived from the naval flotilla on the Orleans station; an order for that purpose was accordingly given.

On receiving the order of the 22d of June, it is believed that the General made every possible effort to procure the transports for his army; but the sickness which afflicted the army, and the whole country, had also extended itself to the marine: owing to this circumstance, and the distance of the vessels from New Orleans, unexpected delays occurred; in addition to which, it being found necessary to have the assistance of the public boats at Fort Adams, which required repairs, the General found himself unable to embark the army until the month of September, as stated in my letter of the 30th of January last.

At such time as the honorable committee may be pleased to appoint, I shall be ready to attend on them, and to give such further information as may be required.

With respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Honorable THOMAS NEWTON, Chairman.

A No. 2.

Letter from the Secretary of War to General James Wilkinson.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1808.

SIR: I am directed, by the President of the United States to have the necessary measures taken, without delay, for assembling as large a proportion of our regular troops, at New Orleans and its vicinity, as circumstances will permit. You will please, therefore, to issue preparatory orders for the transportation to New Orleans of the 3d, 5th, and 7th regiments of infantry, with a battalion consisting of four companies from the 6th regiment, together with the companies of light dragoons, light artillery, and riflemen, raised in the States and territories to the southward of New Jersey. The troops, generally, in the Atlantic States, should be assembled at Savannah, Charleston, South Carolina, Washington, North Carolina, Norfolk and Hoods, Fort M'Henry and Fort Millin, where suitable vessels will be provided for their transportation.

The troops raised in the Western States, together with the late Captain Bissell's company, will be provided with suitable boats for descending the Ohio and Mississippi. Captain Boote's company should march by land, from the Ocmulgee to Fort Stoddert or Fort St. Stephens. The field officers of each regiment of infantry, and one field officer of the respective corps of light dragoons, light artillery, and riflemen, should be marched with their corps; and a major, with the battalion from the 6th regiment of infantry, together with the surgeons and mates of the regiments of infantry; a surgeon to the respective corps of dragoons, artillery, and riflemen; and a mate with the battalion of the 6th regiment of infantry. Provisions for seventy-five days, with a supply of water for thirty-five days, should be put on board of each vessel for the men on board. Medicine and hospital stores, camp kettles, &c., &c. will be forwarded, with ammunition and tents.

In giving your orders for the assemblage of the troops at the different points, it will not be necessary to give any indications of their ultimate destination.

One subaltern of each company, best qualified for the recruiting service, should remain at the respective rendezvous, with instructions to continue that service with all possible celerity: and to have their recruits assembled at the garrisons on the sea-boards of the respective Atlantic States; and at Newport, in Kentucky, and Massac, from the Western States. It may, however, be advisable to direct the recruits, enlisted in the interior of Pennsylvania and Virginia, to assemble on the Western waters.

You will please to take measures for being at New Orleans in season to take command of the army, in that department, as early as practicable; and to have such a disposition of the troops, in that department, formed, as will most effectually enable you to defend New Orleans, and its dependencies, against any invading force.

In case of emergency, you are authorized, by the President of the United States, to call on the Governors of the Orleans and Mississippi territories, for such detachments of the militia as may be deemed necessary.

I am, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

Letter from the Secretary of War to General James Wilkinson.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1809.

SIR:

In my letter of the 27th instant, a concern was expressed for the health of the troops, together with a confidence in your experience, knowledge of country, and entire competency and disposition to adopt every necessary measure respecting that very important object.

On inspecting the general instructions given by this department 2d December, 1808, it appears that the troops were to be assembled at New Orleans; an apprehension that the letter of this instruction may be construed to limit any measures which your own judgment might suggest, respecting a change of position, induces me to remove any such obstacle, if it shall have had an influence.

By the returns of the 24th March, it appears that more than one-fourth part of the troops were sick.

Without a knowledge of this fact, the removal of the army from New Orleans, during the summer and autumnal months, is suggested by every consideration of prudence and experience.

If, therefore, such removal shall not, on receipt of this letter, have been already commenced, you will be pleased to give the necessary orders to have it effected immediately.

After leaving the necessary garrison, consisting of old troops, at New Orleans, it will be desirable that all the others should be transported either to the high ground, in the rear of Fort Adams, or a part of them in the rear of Natchez; perhaps both these stations should be occupied, a division of the troops being more favorable to their health, than quartering the whole together in one body; of this you will judge. The primary objects will be to preserve the health and lives of the men; next, to have them so quartered as will best admit of a regular system of order, government, and discipline, with as much economy as is practicable.

I am, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

Extract of a letter from General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

NEW ORLEANS, May 29, 1809.

SIR:

After much inquiry, I have determined on a spot for the encampment of the troops. It was a difficult matter, from the localities of the country, to adjust; and being an object of primary importance, in relation to economy, discipline, and health, it has truly occupied all my cares and attentions, and will, I hope, be my excuse for inattention to minor objects.

Your predecessor had spoken with me respecting the site of Galveztown, on the Amite river, about sixty miles north of this place, and I proposed reconnoitering; but the idea was no sooner promulgated than some of the most ancient inhabitants called to inform me that it was the most sickly spot in the territory, and that the Spaniards had actually abandoned it on that account.

The advantages of this position would have been public ground, public wood, and the removal of our recruits from the allurements and sinister seductions of this licentious place. Its disadvantages, the proximity of the Spanish occupancy, and its distance from the most assailable points of the coast. Its character, and the prejudices which prevail against it, I believe on just grounds, are decisive on my determination; and with the general voice of the American and Creole in favor of it, I have selected a piece of ground on the left bank of the Mississippi, below this city about four leagues, which I find perfectly dry at this moment, although the surface of the river, restrained by its dykes, is, in general, three feet above the level of the country; you will put your finger on the spot, at the head of the English Turn, just where the route to the settlements on the Terre au Boeuf leaves the river.

The disadvantages of this position are, private ground, private wood, and its vicinity to this city; the attractions of which will divert our green officers from due attention to their profession, and will expose them, as well as the men, to the arts, intrigues, dissipation, and corruption, of my personal enemies, and the enemies of the administration and the Government, who are as busy, under the management of Clark and his cabal, as fiends of hell, to corrupt and seduce men and officers from their duty, and to excite discontent and sedition. But its advantages are, promised health, the best water of the country, the accommodation and comforts of a market, the immediate protection of the city, and the prompt defence of the river and the lakes against an invading force. Under such considerations, and the rapid advance of the season, I could pause no longer, but shall proceed to take the position, and make the necessary establishments for the reception and safe keeping of the stores and provisions necessary to supply and support the troops, and for the comfortable lodgement of the sick and well.

Extract of a letter from General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP, TERRE AU BOEUF, June 19, 1809.

Your letters, of the 30th April and 4th ultimo, did not reach New Orleans until the last mail, the 14th instant, though we received, at the same time, the President's speech.

I am happy that I have so far anticipated your wishes as to have encamped the troops, though I have not sought the position you recommended; nor should I have done so, while permitted to exercise my discretion, and for the following reasons: The movement to Fort Adams, or to Natchez, must have been made by water, as the Spaniards will not permit our passage through West Florida; the toil, the time, and exposition to the sun, in ascending the river one hundred leagues, with a corps of two thousand, would probably have diseased nine-tenths of the men, many of whom were in a convalescent state, and as many sick; the expense of transportation would have exceeded twelve, or might have reached twenty thousand dollars; the position is too remote for the seasonable protection of New Orleans against external attack or internal commotion; and, after all, we might have found the upper country more sickly than the bank of the Mississippi, which frequently occurs. The movement to this place, on the contrary, was done without incommodation to the well, or injury to the sick, and at no expense, because the chaloups which transported them will be employed in erecting the necessary temporary buildings, and for flooring the men's tents. It is impossible to decide whether we shall have a sickly or healthy season, but our proximity to the waters of the ocean, from which we have a breeze, together with appearances, so far, encourage us to believe in the latter; for, although we brought more than five hundred sick and convalescents to this ground, which had been previously occupied by five hundred and sixty men, from the 1st instant we have lost three men only, and one of these by an apoplexy. The morning reports of the 13th and 16th will speak for our convalescence, but will exhibit, at the same time, a frightful number of sick; yet you are to understand that nine-tenths of these are strongly convalescent, and are returned sick by order, to prevent their being detailed for the general fatigues, to which we are now, and shall be for some time to come, necessarily exposed. Whatever may be the result, rest assured, sir, that the safety of those who are entrusted to my charge impress me with an awful sense of responsibility, and will occupy my first attentions, assiduities, and cares; and it is a source of pleasurable reflection to me, that the aspects and accommodation of the position have prepossessed every man and officer in its favor. We have a good market of vegetables, milk, eggs, and fowls, from the settlements of Terre au Boeuf, and I shall make such arrangements in the sutling department as entirely to exclude the use of ardent spirits, which have been the bane of the service, and has destroyed more men than every other cause. I shall, at the same time, encourage the use of malt liquors, and small red wines, which may be had almost as cheap as whiskey.

As the troops must not return to New Orleans, one hundred and fifty men being sufficient for the garrison of that place, it would appear as a necessary consequence that we must erect a cantonment somewhere, of which I cannot be too early advised, whether it be here or at Natchez. If here, the proprietor will sell a site to the Government; or he will give the use of the ground, with pasturage enclosures for our horses and cattle, and fire wood, the year round, for two thousand men, at five hundred dollars per month; and I do not believe better terms could be had in the Mississippi territory. Our wood would cost in New Orleans, one thousand one hundred dollars per month in summer, and three thousand five hundred dollars in winter. Should our force be kept up, and this place be fixed on, the huts can be put up by the men in a short period, and at a trifling expense; and the circumstance of receiving our subsistence on the river, instead of the interior of the upper country, will save two cents per ration.

I submit these observations to you for your consideration, as is my duty, to aid your judgment, and shall be ready to execute the Presidential will.

Extracts of a letter from the Secretary of War to General James Wilkinson, dated

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1809.

Being unable to perceive any advantages in the position which you have selected for an encampment, as stated in your letter of the 29th May, which give it a preference over the high grounds in the rear of Fort Adams, or its vicinity, to which my letter of the 30th April directed, conditionally, the removal of the troops, I am left to presume, either that my letter has not been received, or that some causes unknown to me, and reconcilable with the objects stated in that letter, have governed your decision.

On receiving this letter, you will be pleased immediately to embark all the troops, leaving a sufficient garrison of old troops at New Orleans and Fort St. Philip, and proceed with them to the high ground in the rear of Fort Adams, and to the high ground in the rear of Natchez, (the public ground) and form encampments, dividing them equally, or in such proportions, between the two places, as your own judgment shall direct. The enclosed copy of an order from the Navy Department will present to you the means of transportation. The movement of the troops will be committed entirely to your direction.

W. EUSTIS.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1809.

Sir:

The Secretary of War having made application for the use of the gunboats under your command, for the purpose of removing the troops, under the command of General Wilkinson, up the Mississippi, you may retain as many of the boats as you may think absolutely necessary at your present station, and detach the remainder of them on this service, which I contemplate to be simply of the transport kind. The boats so detached are to continue on that service until the removal of the troops shall have been completed, unless contingencies shall arise which may require their being recalled previously; of which you are to judge. You are, yourself, to remain, during this service, at your station; and the boats having returned, you will be at liberty to avail yourself of the permission already forwarded you, "to come to the Atlantic States." You will inculcate on the officers commanding this detachment, the necessity of harmonizing with the military in every matter necessary to the most speedy attainment of the object intended to be effected.

Respectfully yours,

PAUL HAMILTON.

Captain DAVID PORTER, New Orleans.

Extracts of a letter from General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, July 23, 1809.

Sir:

Your duplicate, of the 22d ultimo, reached New Orleans by the last mail, on the 19th, and came to my hands on the night of the 20th, at 10 o'clock, P. M.; the original has not yet arrived.

The peremptory tenor of your order for the removal of the troops has relieved me from an oppressive load of responsibility, and I have lost not a moment in entering on the execution. Nothing on my part shall be wanting to effect the transition, in the manner the most favorable and least afflictive to the troops; though, as it is impossible to control the effects of the climate, I fear it will be in vain for us to fly from disease in this region with our unseasoned recruits: for it occurs to me, that, when we took possession of the present healthful site at Columbian Springs, near Fort Adams, we had two hundred and forty-six men down at one time, out of about five hundred.

I am undetermined whether to move in a body or by detachment, but shall pursue that course which promises the greatest expedition. I fear delay on the part of the gunboats, because I know from experience the gentlemen of the navy abhor the idea of converting their vessels of war into transports; and, from the report of Lieutenant Carroll, it would appear that twenty-four gunboats, the number on this station, would not carry more than nine hundred and sixty men, little more than half our force. I have, however, a remedy for this difficulty, and if the gunboats are furnished, shall leave behind none but those who are too ill to be removed.

You will discover from my letter, of the 18th ultimo, the causes which opposed our ascent of the river; the employ of the gunboats removes the expense, and the labor of the sailors will save that of the troops, but the tardiness of the movement, and the heat of the sun in dog-days, must endanger our health.

I am so sensible of the necessity of economy, that I tremble at the idea of putting my name to paper for any thing; but my obligations to the service leave me no alternative. You shall not, however, have cause of complaint from my administration.

This establishment has cost something; but that cost will bear a comparison with antecedent expenses, and our camp, with the necessary accommodations, is nearly completed; after which we should not have cost the public more than six or eight hundred dollars per month, the year round, for every incidental expense, wood, pasturage, and quarters, included.

Under all circumstances, I must frankly say, that, was my discretion permitted, I should stay here and hazard the consequences; but, as there would be hazard, I am glad of your order to move, not only as it lessens my responsibility, but because the change of place may prove salutary to our men. In all events, you may depend on whatever my judgment, experience, personal exposition, and attention, can effect.

A No. 3.

CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, August 19, 1809.

Sir:

I have not received the scrip of a pen from you since the 30th of June, but am progressing rapidly in my arrangements for moving the troops, an object near my heart, and which occupies all my attentions.

Our prospects from the gunboats are bad indeed; not one of them has, as yet, been reported to me in readiness to commence the voyage, and the preparation is a difficult one, owing to the general sickness of their crews, and the impracticability of shipping men: but I have ordered certain condemned barges from Fort Adams, which have been lying there since 1807, and are now repairing and equipping them, at the expense of a few nails and a small quantity of oakum and tar for the voyage. To these I shall add, if the gunboats fail me, three or four hired barges to take a full company each. And with this transport, I hope I may, by marching the well, be able to move every man from hence whose health may permit, and that I shall make good my landing at Natchez, or in that vicinity, in twenty days after we get under way. The operation is a laborious one, and somewhat hazardous; but you may rest assured that whatever zeal, activity, and attention, can accomplish, shall be done on my part.

Our sick have increased considerably; but our maladies are confined almost universally to the fever and ague. Nearly all the officers have had it; but we have not lost one, nor do I expect we shall.

Among the thousand difficulties I have had to combat, that of the department of provisions is not the least considerable. The clamors of the troops have been loud and just, and I have not been able to remedy their complaints. I have offered as high as a hundred dollars for a small cow, without effect; and the flour, generally, in New Orleans, from some unknown cause, has this season been affected by the climate immediately after landing. But, in consequence of the utter failure of the contractor to furnish bread or flour to the troops, for two or three days successively, I yesterday ordered a purchase, on any terms, of one hundred barrels, which arrived this morning, but has been refused by the contractor's agent, who got down a few barrels the last night, and, of consequence, I am compelled to order the issue to be made by the brigade quartermaster, for account of the contractor, which adds to my pains and perplexities.

Were the contractor here, from my knowledge of his character, I know these difficulties would not occur; but unfortunately his business is confined to a young man without knowledge or experience, and apparently of an obstinate, perverse disposition. I wish, indeed, that he may not oblige me to take the whole business out of his hands, and appoint a commissary to purchase and supply; but in the last extremity only shall I resort to this step.

The inhabitants of this whole country are now down with the prevailing disease of the camp—a step which, according to them, has never before occurred; and the town is afflicted by bilious affections.

I am alarmed for our medical and hospital expenses; but I do not understand that a particle of either has yet arrived for the new levies, and, of course, I have no alternative but to submit to the requisitions of the surgeons: we shall not, however, press your appropriations for this department, although the consumption of five or six hundred sick must be considerable.

With perfect respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

The Hon. WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

I.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Pay Office, April 10, 1810.

SIR:

In compliance with the requisition which you have communicated to me, as made to you by the committee of Congress, "whether the paymaster of the detachment of the army of the United States, ordered for the defence of Orleans, had in his hands the funds necessary for the payment of the troops." I have the honor to state that, from the best estimate I could form, the sum of $250,000 appeared sufficient for that object, for the year 1809; and that Lieutenant Simeon Knight, the district paymaster in that quarter, was furnished with $100,000 in the early part of that year, on his bills in favor of the receiver of public moneys at Orleans; that $100,000 were remitted him in July last, and received by him before the 7th of August; and he was, moreover, authorized, on the 14th of June last, to draw on me for $50,000—$40,000 of which he has since drawn for, which, I presume, he considered as sufficient to pay the troops in his district, to the 31st of December last.

In addition to the foregoing, he has authority to draw for $60,000, to commence the payment of the troops for the present year.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT BRENT, Paymaster U. S. Army.

The Hon. WM. EUSTIS, Esq. Secretary of War.

K.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1810.

SIR:

In addition to the information which I had the honor to communicate, in person, to the committee, relative to the 3d head of inquiry, contained in your letter of the 19th of February, viz: "Whether the detachment, during the encampment at Terre au Boeu, suffered, in any respect, for the want of regular and necessary supplies?" I have the honor to state, that, it appears, from the enclosed copy of a letter from the General, dated August 19, 1809, that much dissatisfaction existed in respect to the quality of the provisions furnished by the contractor; that the supply was not at all times regular, and that the difficulty of procuring fresh meat was almost insurmountable. These representations have been corroborated from other sources of intelligence. By the 2d article of the contract for supplying provisions to the troops, it is provided: "That it shall be in the option of the general, or officer commanding an army or a great military district, to direct when, and how often, fresh or salted meat shall be issued, by general orders, to be promulgated a reasonable time before that issue is to commence."

By the 4th article, "whenever, in the opinion of the commanding officer, the provisions offered to be issued are unsound, unfit for use, or of an unmerchantable quality, a survey shall be held thereon by two disinterested persons, one to be chosen by the commanding officer, and the other by the contractor, or his agent; and, in case of disagreement, a third person to be chosen by mutual consent, who shall have power to condemn such part of the provisions as to them may appear unfit for use." If the contractor or his agent fail or neglect to appoint a person to inspect the provisions, after reasonable notice in writing, the commanding officer may appoint such persons as he may think proper.

The 5th article authorizes the commanding general, "in case of absolute failure or deficiency in the quantity of provisions, contracted to be delivered and issued," to supply the deficiency by purchase, at the risk of the contractor. The power conferred by the last article was, in one instance, exercised; that those granted by the 4th and 5th articles were not exercised, can be accounted for by this Department, on the presumption only, that, in the opinion of the General, the country could not furnish the supplies.

Complaints have also been made of a want of medicine and hospital stores. It appears from the enclosed extract of a letter from Mr. Linnard, military agent at Philadelphia, of the 31st ultimo, that a stock of medical and hospital stores, for two thousand men, for three months, which were ordered for New Orleans by this Department, in December, 1808, arrived at their place of destination on the 5th of April following; (at this period the whole of the additional force had not reached that place) and that the brig North Star, which transported the clothing and the annual supply of medicine and hospital stores, for the new troops on that station, arrived on or about the 22d of August last.

In addition to these supplies it appears, from the accounts of the military agent at New Orleans, rendered to the accountant of this Department, that, between the months of March, 1809, and January, 1810, medical and hospital stores, and other articles for the use of the sick, were purchased, and paid for to the amount of 11,800 dollars. When to this it is added, that the agent was at all times subject to the order of the commanding officer, and bound to comply with his requisitions for all articles necessary, in his opinion, for the health and accommodation of the troops, the causes of any alleged deficiencies are inexplicable by this Department.

With perfect consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 12, 1808.

SIR:

On account of the troops it will be proper for you to procure, and deliver, on the orders of the commanding officer, such articles as he may deem necessary for the public service.

You will, at all times, charge all articles so delivered to the proper head of expenditure; and to prevent any mistakes in your accounts, when the orders to you are not so explicit as to enable you to decide under what head the article should be charged, you will request the commanding officer to give you such information as the case may require. You will advance no money except for articles actually received, or for services performed. The expenditures should be as economical as the good of the service will permit. No articles will, I trust, be required of you but such as the nature and good of the service actually demand: such as workmen, and materials for fortifications for quarters; transportation and camp equipage; tents, and other articles for barracks or camp, will be sent from this quarter to your care, as well as cannon and ammunition.

I am, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

A. D. ABRAHAMS, Esq. New Orleans.

L No. 2.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 4, 1809.

SIR:

A. D. Abrahams, Esq. military agent for the Southern department, being solicitous to relinquish that office, the President of the United States has appointed you to succeed him; and, should the Senate, at their next session, advise and consent to said appointment, you will be commissioned accordingly.

Your office, as military agent, is considered as a substitute for what has generally been called a deputy quartermaster general; and your department includes all the military posts within the territory of Orleans, and in that part of the Mississippi territory lying south of the 32d degree of north latitude, including all those on the Mobile and its waters.

Before you enter on the duties of your agency, you will execute the enclosed bond, with two or more sufficient securities, and will take and subscribe the oath of office, and the oath prescribed by the act, entitled "An act fixing the military peace establishment." As soon as the bond is duly executed, you will forward it, with the oaths, to this Department.

You will consider the assistant military agents, and the quartermasters, whether brigade or regimental, within your department, as under your direction; you will furnish them with funds, for which they will be accountable to you. They will correspond with, and make regular returns to you of all articles received by them, with proper vouchers for all deliveries and expenditures. They are not to make any purchases or expenditures, excepting what shall be absolutely necessary, without your particular direction.

You will receive herewith a copy of the rules and articles of war for your government; and of the regulations of this Department; to which, as far as they regard your duties, and are not inconsistent with these instructions, you will, in all respects, conform.

You will, with promptness, and in the most safe and economical manner, cause all military, medical, and hospital stores, and all goods for Indians, which you may receive for transportation, to be forwarded to their respective destinations.

You will procure, and deliver, on the order of the commanding officer in your department, such articles as he may deem necessary for the public service. You will, at all times, charge all articles so delivered to the proper head of expenditures; and to prevent any mistakes in your accounts, when the orders to you are not so explicit as to enable you to decide under what head the articles should be charged, you will request the commanding officer to give you such explanation as the case may require. You will advance no money except as before directed, or for articles actually received, or for services performed. The expenditures should be as economical as the good of the service will permit. No article, it is presumed, will be required of you, but such as the nature and good of the service actually demand. Should it happen, however, at any time, that demands are made upon you to a large amount, the propriety of complying with which you may doubt, and where delay may not, in your judgment, prove injurious to the public interest, you are to consult this Department.

If Mr. Cox, the purveyor of public supplies, shall request you to purchase any articles which may be procured in your vicinity, at less expense than at Philadelphia, you will please to make such purchases, he furnishing you with the money.

In addition to the duties of military agent, you will procure such materials, and hire such laborers and mechanics, as may be required of you by the engineer, for erecting, completing, and repairing such works as have, or may be ordered for the defence and protection of New Orleans and its vicinity. Your accounts, for expenditures under this head, you will keep in conformity with the enclosed instructions from the accountant of this Department.

You will be allowed one clerk for your office of military agent, at the rate of $750 per annum.

For your services, as agent for fortifications, you will receive a reasonable commission on the moneys necessarily expended in the performance of its duties.

You will, from time to time, seasonably transmit to this Department estimates of the moneys that may be required to meet the expenditures in your agencies; on the receipt of which the requisite funds will be ordered to your credit in the office of discount and deposit at New Orleans.

Should you accept of the military agency for the Southern department, you will please to proceed to New Orleans without delay, and there take upon yourself the duties of your appointment. Major Pike, the acting military agent, is instructed, by the enclosed letter, to deliver to you all the public papers, documents, and property, in his possession, and to pay over to you the balance of public moneys remaining in his hands, which you will please to receive, giving him your duplicate receipts for the same.

I am, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

A. McCULLOCH, Esq.

L No. 3.

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 16, 1810.

SIR:

In compliance with your request, made this morning, I have the honor herewith to transmit No. 1, a copy of the instructions given to Mr. A. D. Abrahams, military agent at New Orleans, dated December 12, 1808.

On the resignation of Mr. Abrahams, Mr. Andrew McCulloch was appointed to succeed him, under instructions, a copy of which, No. 2, is herewith enclosed, bearing date May 4, 1809. Mr. McCulloch died in a few days after his arrival, on which Major Zebulon M. Pike, of the 6th regiment, was appointed by General Wilkinson as successor to Mr. McCulloch, and continued to discharge the duties of that office, under the instructions given to Mr. McCulloch, until after the removal of the troops from the encampment at Terre au Beuf.

Representation being made by the accountant of this Department, that many articles in the accounts rendered by Mr. A. D. Abrahams, the military agent, were charged at extravagant prices, the necessity of some of which did not appear, and the prices of others being deemed exorbitant, the military agent was informed on the 10th of August last, that he was not authorized to comply with such requisitions in future. This is the only limitation of the instructions before mentioned, which has been made by this Department.

It appears, from the instructions to Mr. McCulloch, that he was required to render, from time to time, to this Department, estimates of the probable expenditures in his agency; on the receipt of which, moneys were to be ordered to his credit in the office of discount and deposit at New Orleans. In practice, this arrangement was found inconvenient, and not calculated to meet occurring emergencies. The military agent therefore continued to draw bills on this Department, which were regularly paid on being presented.

The enclosed statement will exhibit their amount for the year 1809.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

The Hon. THOMAS NEWTON, Chairman, &c.

Extract of a letter from William Linnard, Esquire, Military Agent, to the Secretary of War, dated PHILADELPHIA, March 31, 1810.

SIR:

"Your favor of the 28th inst. has been received. In answer to your inquiries, I have the honor to state, that the medicine and hospital stores, shipped on board the schooner Hilman, were those ordered on the 26th of December, 1808; three months' stock for 2000 men. The schooner sailed from Philadelphia, the 7th of January, 1809. The day she sailed, the frost set in extremely severe, and so much ice was made in the course of the night, the captain was obliged to make a harbor, where she remained all winter; she sailed again on the 6th of March, and arrived at New Orleans the 5th of April, and delivered the stores the 7th and 8th.

"The brig North Star sailed from Philadelphia the 6th of July, 1809, had a long passage, arrived at New Orleans about the 22nd of August, and delivered the stores in three days after her arrival. Anxious to send the goods by this vessel, the only one in port destined for that place, I detained her six days waiting for the clothing; the last was put on board the day she sailed."

SIR:

In reply to the inquiry of the committee, "whether the paymaster of that detachment of the army of the United States, ordered for the defence of New Orleans, had in his hands the funds necessary for the payment of the troops?" I beg leave to refer them to the enclosed statement of this date, from the paymaster of the army.

In answer to your other inquiry of the 9th instant, I have the honor to state, for the information of the committee, that the brig North Star, which transported the clothing for that detachment, appears (from the extract of Mr. Linnard's letter now before the committee, to have sailed from Philadelphia on the 6th of July, 1809, and to have arrived at New Orleans, on or about the 22d of August following, which was within twelve months of the time that the men of that detachment had generally received their clothing for the preceding year.

With perfect consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Esaius Preble's deposition, March 16, 1810.

Esaius Preble, of the United States' regiment of artillery, deposes, that, about the last of April, 1809, a detachment of the United States' troops, under the command of Captain Peter, attached to different regiments, descended the river Mississippi for New Orleans; they halted at Fort Adams, at which place I was stationed: at that time they appeared to be young, able for any duty, and well clothed. A number of smaller detachments afterwards passed down said river in a similar situation.

About the middle of October following, that part of the additional army that had been stationed in the neighborhood of New Orleans, halted at Fort Adams, on their way up the river for Washington, Mississippi territory, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Beall. After being encamped two or more days on the bank of the river, a party, consisting of one hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers and privates, from the regiment of light artillery, light dragoons, 3d, 5th, and 7th regiments of infantry, and regiment of riflemen, was sent into Fort Adams and buildings attached to the fort. On, or about the 23d of October, 1809, I was directed by the commanding officer of the post, to take charge of said troops and report their situation. I applied to Doctor Thruston, the surgeon of the seventh infantry, in whose charge they were left, and the only officer left with them, for a list of said men. I then made an examination, and found seventeen had died; the residue, except twenty, were very sick; eight or ten were in an open room in which they could have no fire, some of them no blanket, and almost naked; and all, with one or two exceptions, extremely dirty. The last of November following, fourteen more of the said troops were left sick at Fort Adams, which, together with those left in October, amounted to one hundred and thirty-four, from which sixty-eight died at said fort.

During the last three years, there have been moored at Fort Adams, from eight to eighteen boats, that would carry, on an average, thirty men, public property, under the direction of the commanding officer of the post. In August 1809, eight or ten of said boats were despatched to New Orleans, one of which sunk on its passage. During the last year, from the company stationed at Fort Adams, not more than five men died: from seven companies of the 2d regiment of infantry stationed at Columbian Springs, not more than eight died the last year.

In the vicinity of Fort Adams and Columbian Springs, beef, poultry, butter, eggs, and vegetables, such as the country produces, may be obtained at any season of the year. During my residence in the army, clothing for the troops has been forwarded to the commanding officers of companies six months in advance, and issued to the troops in the same manner. The clothing for the companies at Fort Adams and Columbian Springs arrived at said fort by the way of New Orleans, in July, 1809.

No. 2.

Deposition of William D. Beall, lieutenant colonel of the 5th infantry of the army of the United States, taken by the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

I arrived at Camp, Terre au Bœuf, 12 or 15 miles below New Orleans, on the river Mississippi, on the 12th of June, 1809.

The troops were regularly encamped in tents, in two lines, covering ground about 800 yards in length, and 75 in depth, (the depth of the encampment was about 175 yards.) The tents, after a while, were raised and floored with plank taken from the Kentucky boats which were used to transport the army from Orleans. The ground was low, as is the case of all in the vicinity of Orleans, and, particularly after rain, wet, and a part being cleared of the bushes, weeds, &c. by the troops, was muddy, and the back part, during the wet season, a little marshy. To remedy the disadvantage of such ground, ditches were cut in every direction; indeed every precaution was taken to render the camp comfortable; the General seeming to have an eye to every circumstance, being absent from the camp not more than six or eight days from the 12th of June to 10th of September following. Little arbors, covered with palmetto, were erected at the necessary distance from each other, on the line of sentinels, that each man, in his place, might be screened from the piercing rays of the sun, and sheltered from the rain; and these arbors were also erected from right to left of the line between the front and rear, that the men might set and mess in comfort and cleanliness. A ditch was dug parallel with the encampment, in the rear, to afford a dry walk to the sentinels, and on which to erect the before mentioned arbors.

I do not think half the ground used for the camp was cleared by the troops; this must have been an advantage to the proprietor, but I rather apprehend the ditches were a disadvantage.

A tolerable large hospital was erected of materials partly from the boats before mentioned, and partly from the neighboring woods, into which the most reduced men were put, under the care of a very attentive and experienced surgeon: some of the sick, as occasion required, were sent to the hospital at Orleans; the vessel containing medicine and hospital stores not arriving until August: as the want of these articles occurred, the general directed them to be procured at Orleans, as also poultry, to be given to the men most in need, at the discretion of the surgeons, but the supply of this last article was not regular. A captain of the line, (captain Dale) of medical profession, was ordered to procure medicine, and take upon himself the usual duties of a surgeon.

Strict attention to the sick, and their accommodation, was enjoined on the officers; care taken to separate those ill from the duty men, and a police officer daily appointed to scrutinize into the regularity of the camp, and the quality of the provision, and to report every defect, neglect, or impropriety.

Provisions of flour, or bread, and pork, were regularly supplied, and, after a little time, beef; and when these were bad, remonstrances, protests, and condemnation were resorted to; and, in one instance, a purchase of 100 barrels of flour was made by the General. Flour, in the Southern country, is apt to sour, and, at a certain season, it is very difficult to get good.

On the 4th of July, a general review was made, and the troops fired and performed some evolutions tolerably well; after this, symptoms of mutiny were manifested, not by an assembling of men, but a secret preparing for such an event, and a threat, which was overheard by some of the more orderly men, reported. There appeared much dissatisfaction among many of the men, and some officers, proceeding, as I supposed, from the encampment. An expectation that this army would be discharged by the extra session of Congress, being disappointed, I presume, served to heighten discontent.

There being no regular established armory or armorers, some of the arms were useless for want of repair; these, together with those of the sick and dead men, were delivered to the brigade quartermaster, except some instances where the officers chose to pack them themselves, were packed in boxes, and either transported with the troops, or deposited in New Orleans.

The boats employed in conveying the troops and baggage up the river were four gunboats, carrying about 40 men each, four keel boats, borrowed of the inhabitants of New Orleans, and 9 out of 11 brought down from Fort Adams, and repaired by the troops; one quartermaster's boat, and one contractor's, attending the movement.

Previous to the embarkation, 3 companies, of the 6th infantry, under the command of Major Pike, were ordered to the garrison of Orleans, and between the 1st and 12th of September, the army embarked, and, making some delay nearly opposite the city, owing, I think, very probably, to a defect in one of the artillery boats, proceeded, on the 23d, up the river, under the command of Major Backus, of the light dragoons. I had been taken sick about the 5th of September, and was moved up to Orleans the 10th, and, recovering sufficient strength, followed the army, and reached the troops about 50 miles up the river, and, after two or three days, took command, the General being ill in Orleans. Every preparation for this movement was made, which the General could command, or thought sufficient, and yet the sufferings were such as would excite pity in the most callous heart. The men, unable to bear fatigue, had been left at Orleans; those able, were marched on the river bank, while the boats, with the weaker part, managed by able men, under the direction of officers, ascended from 8 to 15 miles a day, as the wind and current would permit, to the best ground to be found for the accommodation of a camp. Sickness and deaths increasing as we progressed, a consultation of the surgeons and officers was held: the surgeons declared it useless to administer medicine in the unsettled state of the troops, and the officers urging all reasonable haste to a place of rest, where the skill of the physician, and effect of medicine, might have a fair trial. Under these impressions, two hospitals were established, one at Point Coupee, and one at Fort Adams, where the weakest of the men were left, under the care of surgeons, guards, and attendants, with medicines, and hospital stores, and provisions. The loss of men in the time of this movement, (from the 1st to the 12th September, to the 31st of October) including the two hospitals, was near 300 in deaths, and some desertions.

As the boats arrived at Natchez, carriages were procured to move the sick and baggage to the intended cantonment, near the town of Washington, and now, the men a little rested from their late unexampled fatigue, began to clean their arms, rendered rusty from the unavoidable neglect of them while on the march, and the necessary tools being provided, the effective men, joined by those most able of the convalescents, under the superintendance of their officers, began to erect huts on the ground chosen by the General, a place healthy, elegant, and convenient to springs of fine water.

My knowledge of the country about Orleans is very limited, but am of opinion the ground at Terre au Bœuf was as eligible for a camp as any in the vicinity of the city.

Of the propriety of continuing in the vicinity of Orleans for defence, it does not become me to speak, not having the information which suggested the measure.

I doubt not the low situation of the ground about Orleans contributed to the mortality of the troops, but it is not improbable that the higher ground would have proved fatal too: for it is a remark, very generally received, that Northern constitutions undergo sickness, more or less; when subject to a fixed residence in a climate so Southern; and to this may be added, an almost universal acknowledgment, that the year 1809 was much more sickly than any for many years.

When I left the army at Washington, about the 27th of November, I thought the men were recovering in a good degree.

The clothing was delivered out to the officers commanding companies, on our arrival at Washington, and, in necessary cases, the men were supplied, but generally, I think, it was judged best to retain it till the dirty and fatiguing job of building was accomplished.

I conjectured, from some expressions in one of the General's letters to the Secretary of War, that an order for removing the camp had been given; but where to I did not understand.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, 88.

Be it remembered, that, on this 21st day of March, 1810, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for said county, appeared William D. Beall, and made oath, in due form of law, that the above and foregoing facts, as stated, are just and true, to the best of his knowledge.

DANIEL RAPINE.

No. 3.

Deposition of Doctor Alexander Macauley, March 21, 1810.

In respect to the local situation of the camp at Terre au Bœuf, I believe it to be more healthy than the city of New Orleans, as I knew several officers and soldiers, who came from camp to town, get sick after being a short time in the latter. I have also been told by a respectable inhabitant of that neighborhood, that Terre au Bœuf was reported the most healthy country in the vicinity of New Orleans. In regard to the mortality of the troops, it may be observed, that new soldiers are apt to sicken, when first embodied, although in much healthier situations; that a large portion of the troops were sick before the army moved from New Orleans; that many of those who are enlisted are of debauched habits, and weakened constitutions, and that such constitutions are little able to resist the violent attacks of the diseases on the Lower Mississippi, where the most robust habits so frequently sink; also, that the mortality amongst the citizens was very great; and I have been informed by those who had resided in that country for ten years, that they had never before witnessed such a fatal season. The General had issued orders authorizing Doctors Spencer and Claude to make requisitions on the military agent for proper accommodations and necessaries for the sick, under which orders, the sick in the hospital in New Orleans, where I was, received such articles as could render them comfortable, and conduce to their recovery. I was stationed at New Orleans, and only visited the camp occasionally; but from what I have heard of the mortality at camp, I do believe that the army would have lost as many, if not more men, had they remained in New Orleans, and I thought the situation of the camp at Terre au Boeuf as good as any I had ever seen in that country; and from what I have heard, I do not suppose a better could have been selected on the territory of the United States, within one hundred and fifty miles of New Orleans. As far as I have been able to observe the conduct of General Wilkinson, I have ever thought him actuated by a zeal for the welfare of the army, and promotion of the public service; and I have frequently witnessed his humanity and attention to sick officers, in having them removed to his own quarters until they were out of danger.

I certify that the foregoing statement is correct, according to the best of my knowledge and belief.

A. MACAULEY.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 21st, 1810.

Sworn and subscribed before me, a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, this 21st day of March, 1810.

DANIEL RAPINE.

Deposition of Doctor Alexander Macauley, March 22, 1810.

In addition to my deposition of yesterday, I must state, that considerable supplies of medicines and hospital stores were purchased at New Orleans, from time to time, as well for the use of the sick in the city, as for those at camp at Terre au Boeuf; and never, to my knowledge, did any difficulty exist as to procuring them. Also, that a considerable supply of hospital stores and medicines arrived from the United States (I think) in the month of August, and that Doctors Spencer and Claude divided them: according to the best of my recollection, Doctor Claude took four-fifths for the use of the troops who ascended the river, and Doctor Spencer the other fifth, for the use of the troops at New Orleans, and in the general hospital at that place. The supply consisted of several large pipes and casks (or hogheads) of wine, brandy, molasses, &c. and boxes, &c. of medicine. This division took place about the time of the removal of the troops from the camp below New Orleans, and the medicines, stores, &c. alluded to above, were embarked on board of the boats which ascended by or from New Orleans.

The facts above are true, according to the best of my memory and belief.

No. 4.

Deposition of Major Electus Backus, of the army of the United States, taken by the committee appointed by the House of Representatives of the United States to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

I arrived in New Orleans about the tenth of May, 1809, at which place I found that General Wilkinson, and most of the troops destined to that station, had arrived.

In the beginning of the month of June, the troops were ordered to leave New Orleans, and to proceed down the river to Terre au Boeuf, where they were directed to encamp. At this time the waters of the Mississippi were so high that at many places it was overflowing the levee, which rendered the ground of our encampment wet and muddy; and was so surrounded with marshes and swamps, as to render it an ineligible place for an encampment. The duty and labor required to put the place in order was too great to be endured in so hot a climate.

The lands on which the troops encamped belonged to Mr. Lasue, to whom the Brigade Quartermaster informed me he had paid several hundred dollars, after the removal of the army, for the use of the lands, house rent, pasture, and firewood; and that no allowance was made for any improvements made on the lands by the army, and that he had sold the buildings erected on the place for the benefit of the United States.

In the month of July, General Wilkinson became alarmed at some improper expressions dropping from some of the soldiers, which, on examination, appeared to have been uttered from a belief that the sickness and deaths the army had experienced was to be attributed to the local position of the camp, and to the unremitted fatigues and hardships they were compelled to endure.

The police of the camp was well attended to, and great exertions made use of to keep it clean, until the sickness of the soldiers became so general as to render it impracticable.

The provisions were such, in particular the flour, that medical men declared it sufficient to injure the health of, and destroy the soldier, independent of any other cause.

The soldiers were from four to six months without their pay, (which they are entitled to every two months,) This put it out of their power to purchase fowls or vegetables, which would have contributed much to their comfort, particularly when sickly. The reasons assigned for their not being paid were various; one of which was, that the Paymaster of the district did not consider it his duty to go from New Orleans to pay the troops, and there being no Paymasters to many of the regiments, payments could not be made; and one cause assigned by General Wilkinson was, that if the men were paid off before they ascended the river many would desert.

The want of clothing was so great that many of the soldiers were almost naked; this was owing to the new clothing not arriving until a short time before the army moved up the river, and was not delivered to the company officers until after they had arrived at Washington, Mississippi Territory. Medicines and medical men some of the regiments were at times destitute of, in consequence of which many of the soldiers perished without having received little, if any, medical assistance.

When the troops took the field in the month of June, they were well provided with tents, but the frequent rains to which they were exposed soon rendered them but a miserable shelter either against the effects of the rain or sun. A few of the most dangerous cases of the sick were at first put in tents pitched in the rear of their respective regiments, but before we left the encampment, the increase of sickness was so great that it was impossible (situated as we were) to separate the sick from the well, and they were to be found, more or less, in every tent in the line.

In consequence of the sickness and deaths of the soldiers, the arms and accoutrements belonging to them were much injured, and in some instances lost, owing to there being no place in which they could be deposited or sheltered from the weather.

Shelters were erected to cover the sentinels from the rays of the sun and frequent showers of rain, but were not completed until the month of August, prior to which time the soldiers suffered much for the want of them. About the first of September, orders were issued for the troops to prepare to embark on board of boats and other craft for Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory. The public boats were collected from different quarters and repaired, some of which, proving unfit for service, were turned in, and private boats taken, which the owners were glad of an opportunity of getting conveyed to Natchez free of charges, and others might have been obtained on the same terms. Nothing could have exceeded the joy expressed by the soldiers on this occasion: it seemed for a time to relieve the drooping spirits of those who were, to appearance, past all hopes of recovery.

At the time the troops commenced their march, General Wilkinson became so indisposed that he could not proceed with them, and remained at New Orleans. I being the only field officer with the troops, the command of them devolved upon me; in which command I continued until the army arrived nearly opposite West Florida. Between the 20th and 31st of October, the troops arrived at Natchez, leaving upwards of one hundred of their sick at Point Coupee, and many others at Fort Adams, at both of which places the greater part died. After the army arrived at their place of destination, the weather became cool, and those that were in a low state of health died, and the remainder became convalescent.

The troops were much relieved at this place by a plentiful market, both in fresh provisions and vegetables, which sold one hundred per cent. cheaper than in New Orleans, or its territory.

The inhabitants of Washington and its vicinity received the army with much affection, and treated them with more attention and friendship than they had hitherto experienced on that southern station. The complaints of the officers did not differ from that of the men, except the scurvy.

A supply of fresh provisions and vegetables were not to be procured in the neighborhood of the camp at Terre au Bœuf, or not short of the New Orleans market.

Question. Could boats have been procured at New Orleans sufficient to convey the troops to Fort Adams or Natchez at any time between the 14th of June and the 10th of September?

Answer. I think they could.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions, particularly the flour, with which the army were supplied during the encampment at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. Bad, generally, particularly the flour, which was frequently sour, mouldy, in lumps, and sometimes full of bugs and worms.

Question. Was the army in a sickly state at the time of removal from New Orleans to Terre au Bœuf, and were the sick removed?

Answer. There was some sickness. Those who were most ill were left in the hospital at New Orleans.

Question. Do you believe that, at the time the troops were using the bad provisions a sufficient supply of good and wholesome provisions could have been procured at New Orleans?

Answer. I believe they could. The General did procure one hundred barrels of good flour for the army.

Question. What proportion of the army were generally ordered on fatigue duty?

Answer. One half of those in health were generally on fatigue duty. Sometimes it was necessary to take men who were not in health to furnish the details of guard duty.

Question. At what time did the fatigue duty cease?

Answer. Not until the latter part of August.

Question. What kind of labor were the last fatigue parties engaged in?

Answer. Building guard houses, shelters for the sentries, and clearing the ground.

Question. During how long a period were the men obliged to sleep on the ground?

Answer. Many of them from three to four weeks; during which time, there being no straw, they had but a single blanket and such palmetto leaves as they could collect to keep them from the damp ground, after which the tents were generally floored with boards from the boats which had conveyed the troops from New Orleans.

Question. At what time was it first known in the camp that orders had been received for the removal of the army?

Answer. Sometime in the month of August.

Question. What other inconveniences besides those specified in the deposition were experienced in the encampment at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. The troops experienced great annoyance from the innumerable quantity of mosquitoes, which were particularly afflicting to the sick. They suffered also very much from the continual rains.

Question. Were you not informed by the Paymaster that he had sufficient funds in his hands to pay off the men?

Answer. I was informed by Mr. Knight that he had the funds, and that, if the men would stop opposite New Orleans on their way up the river, he would pay them off.

Question. Did you not halt opposite New Orleans, and make application for that purpose?

Answer. The troops halted there three days, and I spoke to General Wilkinson on the subject: he replied that the men could not be paid, as, if they were paid off, they would desert.

Question. Was there an acting military agent at New Orleans at the time the troops were there on their way up the river?

Answer. I believe the Brigade Quartermaster did that duty.

Question. Were you provided with funds to defray incidental expenses in conveying the troops up to Natchez?

Answer. We were not. General Wilkinson directed me to take the army up the river, informing me, at the same time, that there was not a dollar in the Quartermaster's Department to defray any extra expenses; that I must take them as they were. On our arrival at Point Coupee an hospital was formed, and about one hundred of the sick left there. There being no necessary supplies to leave with them, a subscription was made by the officers, and upwards of one hundred dollars raised and left with the surgeon, for the purpose of supplying the sick with those articles of which they stood in need, such as fowls, vegetables, &c.

Question. Did General Wilkinson consult any of his officers in selecting Terre au Bœuf as the place of encampment?

Answer. Colonel Smyth and some other officers went down with General Wilkinson to see Terre au Bœuf, but I cannot say how far he consulted them.

Question. Was there dissatisfaction among the officers and men at Terre au Bœuf, and from what cause did it arise?

Answer. There was. It appeared to arise from the unhealthiness of the place, the sufferings of the troops, and the badness of the supplies. Many of the officers signed a petition in the month of July to the General, to remove the army, which was withheld in consequence of his disapproving of it, and declaring he would not remove the troops until he received orders so to do.

Question. When you mention that the last fatigue parties were employed in clearing up the ground, in what manner were they so employed?

Answer. In smoothing the ground by taking up stumps, and filling up holes and ditches.

Question. What quantity of wood land was cleared by the troops?

Answer. I should judge that there were between twenty and thirty acres of new land cleared by them.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, ss.

On this 5th day of April, 1810, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for said county, appeared Electus Backus, and made oath, in due form of law, that the facts stated in the foregoing instrument of writing, which came within his personal knowledge, are true, and those related from the information of others he believes to be true.

Sworn before me,

Examination of Captain George Peter, before the committee appointed "to inquire into the cause or causes of the mortality in that detachment of the army ordered for the defence of New Orleans," taken April 9th, 1810.

Question. At what time did you arrive at New Orleans?

Answer. I think it was between the 26th and 28th of March, 1809, that I arrived there with five companies.

Question. What was the condition of the army during their stay in New Orleans, both as it respects their health and accommodations?

Answer. A part of the troops were quartered in the barracks, a part in the faubourg St. Mary, and a part in the city. The number of the sick increased daily during their stay, which I attributed to their intemperance, to the badness of their provisions, and to the want of discipline and subordination.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions with which the troops were supplied?

Answer. Of the most inferior kinds, of every description: the bread musty, the fresh beef so poor that it was not fit to be issued, and the pork rusty. I have frequently known the troops to throw the pork away. The complaints respecting the provisions were so frequent that I made a representation to General Wilkinson on the subject. He informed me that he would take measures to have better provisions provided; but during my stay I saw little or no improvement.

Question. What appeared to be the most prevalent diseases during the stay of the troops in New Orleans?

Answer. The dysentery, but not of a very malignant nature, and fevers. Of the corps of light artillery I believe only two men died during their stay in New Orleans.

Question. To what cause or causes did you attribute the want of discipline and subordination to which you have alluded?

Answer. To the dispersed situation of the troops in the city of New Orleans, and the impossibility of keeping them within proper bounds.

Question. Is it your opinion that, on the arrival of the troops and during their stay at New Orleans, such a disposition of them could have been made as would have been more favorable to discipline and subordination, and without incurring any additional expense?

Answer. I think a greater number of the troops might have been quartered in the barracks, and the remainder in the faubourg of St. Mary, which would have enabled the officers to have kept their men in better order, but would not have curtailed the expenses much: or, if the troops had been encamped on the plains of the faubourg St. Mary, with proper flooring to their tents, the officers would have had an opportunity of keeping up subordination and discipline, preventing intemperance, and would have saved to the Government a prodigious expense.

Question. Is it your opinion that the encampment of the troops, agreeably to your last suggestion, would have been equally, or more eligible, than their encampment at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. I think it would have been more eligible. Drier ground might have been selected, having the swamp at a much greater distance; vegetables might have been procured in abundance, also milk and fresh provisions, with hospitals sufficiently commodious for the accommodation of the sick.

Question. What time did you leave New Orleans for Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. About the 1st of June an order directing a detachment of the troops consisting of three companies of light artillery, one of dragoons, one of riflemen, one of the third, one of the fifth, and one of the sixth infantry, under the command of Major Pike, was issued. Between the 3d and 5th of June, this detachment fell down to the head of the English Turn, for the purpose of preparing the ground for the accommodation of the corps of light artillery, the regiment of dragoons, regiment of riflemen, the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh regiments of infantry, consisting in the whole of about two thousand men.

Question. In what state did you find the ground intended for the encampment?

Answer. From the right to the centre the ground was as dry as it is generally below the city of New Orleans; but from the centre to the left it was swampy. The first part had been cleared, but the last was covered with willows and palmettos.

Question. At what time did the main body arrive at the encampment?

Answer. Between the 9th and 11th of June.

Question. Was the ground prepared for their encampment when they arrived?

Answer. A part of the left was not cleared, and but little ditching done. A part of the officers and two or three companies of the men had flooring for their tents, the remainder were pitched upon the ground.

Question. What was the reason that a part of the men had flooring for their tents, and the remainder had not?

Answer. I recollect but two companies that were so provided, and the plank for those were procured at New Orleans by the officers, in part at their own expense.

Question. At what time did you leave the camp at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. On the morning of the 12th of June.

Question. How long did you serve in the army of the United States?

Answer. I entered the army in 1799, as a lieutenant of infantry; in 1801, was appointed a lieutenant in the second regiment of artillerists and engineers; in 1802, at the organization of the peace establishment, arranged to the corps of artillerists as a lieutenant; in 1807, promoted to a captaincy in the same corps; and in 1808, at the request of the Secretary of War, transferred to the regiment of light artillery. I resigned my commission on the 11th of June, 1809.

Question. Where have you generally served during the time you have been in the army?

Answer. On the sea-board; on the northern lakes; on the Ohio, Missouri, and at New Orleans, in 1807 and 1809.

COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, to wit:

On the 11th day of April, 1810, Captain George Peter came before me, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God that the foregoing answers is a correct statement of facts, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

THOMAS CORCORAN.

No. 6.

Deposition of Captain John Darrington, of the United States' army, taken by the committee appointed by the House of Representatives of the United States, to inquire into the causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

I joined the army in New Orleans about the first of April, 1809, and was never absent from it until February, 1810. Soon after my arrival in New Orleans, I discovered that the number of our sick began rapidly to increase. The prevalent complaint appeared to be the diarrhoea; it attacked indiscriminately both officers and privates; at this time the deaths were but few in proportion to the number sick. The most dangerous among the sick were provided with hospitals, in which they were well attended to. This diarrhoea was ascribed by our physicians to medicinal effects of the waters of the Mississippi.

The last of May we were directed to prepare for leaving New Orleans. On the 3d of June a camp forming party, consisting of the whole of the light artillery, and the strongest company of the remaining corps, was despatched for Terre au Bœuf. On the 10th of the same month the whole army followed, and on that and the succeeding day arrived at Terre au Bœuf; at this time I conjectured that about one-third of our army were on the sick reports. Although our camp forming party had used every industry, the ground was not in readiness. The tents were pitched in front in the skirt of an old field. From the centre of our encampment to the right had originally been cleared, but was then mostly overgrown with small trees, weeds, &c.; the ground damp; from the centre to the left still remained in its primitive state, and having never been ditched was as yet a marsh. Immediately in the rear was an impassable swamp. The left of the encampment was on the bank of the river, and partly parallel with it, but the river turning nearly at right angles threw the right at a considerable distance. To render this place suitable as soon as possible for the purpose intended, a fatigue of two hundred and twenty men was ordered; this party soon cleared off the trees on the line marked out. When the tents were permanently pitched, the General informed us, that, after having employed several days in inspecting the country in the vicinity of New Orleans, he had selected this place as the most eligible for the encampment. Our fatigue party continued to clear the land at the distance of one hundred yards in the rear; after which they were employed in digging ditches in the intervals between the regiments, into which ditches were run drains leading from the front of the tents. This labor I conceived indispensable, from motives of self defence; otherwise, during the rainy seasons a portion of our encampment would have been inundated. The severest duty performed by our fatigue was the digging of a canal in the rear, extending the whole length of the line, on the banks of which canal was thrown up a permanent levee. This labor, to the best of my recollection, was not commenced until the middle of July, and not finished until in August. Had it been the intention of Government, (as General Wilkinson suggested as probable) to have made this place a permanent cantonment, the canal, together with its levee, would have been of utility as a safeguard against the ensuing season; but if, on the contrary, the place had been selected for a temporary purpose, I should say this labor was not necessary. The provisions were at no time such as could be esteemed good, and frequently so inferior, that nothing but necessity could justify the use of them. On this subject frequent complaints were made to General Wilkinson. At first he attended to them; the provisions were inspected and condemned; it was also said he purchased a hundred barrels of flour; the evil, however, still continued; complaints were again made, but without producing any effect; the General replying, that better provisions could not be had; after this, further complaints were deemed useless. The constant use of damaged provisions was no doubt the primitive cause of that horrid and destructive disease termed the scurvy. Our market furnished but a scanty supply of either fresh provisions or vegetables, which sold from a hundred to a hundred and fifty per cent. higher than at our present cantonment, (Washington, Mississippi territory.) Besides, the men did not derive as much advantage from this scanty and exorbitant market as they might, had they been regularly paid.

Our details were so arranged that one third of the army were on duty each day. This arrangement continuing, without a diminution in proportion to the increase of sickness, soon brought those reported for duty, on duty every other day, and it not unfrequently happened, that, to supply the details, sick men were furnished. For the first month most of the tents were without floors; and as the army was not furnished with straw, the bedding of the soldiers consisted in a single blanket. In this situation they were obliged to sleep on the ground, which, during the month of June and the greater part of July, was constantly damp, and in places for a short time inundated by water. If I recollect accurately, from the middle of June to the last of July, there were but few days without rain, and generally several showers in the same day; during this period and for some time after, the sentinels were unprovided with any description of shelter to protect them either against the rain or sun. The sentinels in the rear of the encampment, until the middle of July, were over their shoes in mud and water, and the fatigue party employed in the same place, in digging the canal, constantly worked in mud and water.

On our first arrival at Terre au Beuf, General Wilkinson gave directions for the erection of a hospital; but, from what cause I am not able to say, the work progressed slowly, and was not finished until a short time before our movement, and when finished was not capable of holding more than sixty or eighty men. We were generally without hospital stores, and when we had them they were in such small quantities as to be of little service. The number of our sick was so great, that it became impossible for the few physicians we had to attend to them, and it sometimes occurred, that men died without ever having received any description of medical assistance. The physicians complained much of the want of medicines, and also, that, from the exposed situation of their patients, the medicine administered frequently proved injurious. The sick and the well lived in the same tents; they generally subsisted on the same provisions; were equally exposed to the constant and incessant torrents of rain, to the scorching heat of the sun, and during the night to the attacks of numberless mosquitoes. They manifested the pains and sufferings they experienced by shrieks and groans, which, during the silence of the night, were distinctly to be heard from one end of the line to the other. It is my candid belief the mosquitoes produced more misery than any other cause. In the night the air was filled with them, and not a man was provided with anything like a bar or net. Thus situated, the sufferings of the unfortunate sick, who were too weak to defend themselves, can perhaps be better imagined than described.

Between the 5th and 10th of July, the officers, impelled by motives of humanity, from the lamentable and distressing situations of the camp, petitioned the General for its removal. I was the bearer of the petition. I met with him on the parade and informed him of my business. At first he appeared to be much astonished; observed that a removal was impossible; that there he had been sent, and there he should remain until ordered away by competent authority. He afterwards made use of a few harsh expressions, such as that the officers were crazy, &c. I did not put into his hands the petition, because I perceived it would have no effect. I then returned, and reported the result. After this all prospect of a removal ceased. In the latter end of July it was rumored that orders had been received from the Secretary of War for our removal, and in the latter end of August, these orders were made public. On this occasion the troops manifested the greatest joy; they seemed to have forgotten all that was passed, and became impatient for the arrival of the day on which they were to leave Terre au Beuf. The first of September, orders were issued to prepare for ascending the river, and between the seventh and eighteenth commenced their ascent by detachments.

On the 20th the army was concentrated opposite New Orleans. Here a halt of two days ensued, to repair the boats. A few of the boats were found unfit for the voyage; but their places were immediately supplied by others belonging to citizens, who, it was said, charged nothing, being glad of an opportunity of getting them to Natchez. On the 23d, after sending a few of our sick to New Orleans, a general movement took place; many more of the sick could have been sent, but we were informed the hospitals could not contain them. The men were crowded in such numbers in the boats, as to preclude every thing like comfort. In many of the boats were two and three companies. This was an evil which could not be remedied: for, had our boats been multiplied, I do not think we should have been able to manage them. In the boat in which I ascended, were three companies, and it was with difficulty I could ever get more than twelve or fifteen men at the oars. For the first few days after we commenced our ascent, the number of deaths were not more than usual. Afterwards they began to increase, and before we arrived at Point Coupee, it became a first duty at our nightly encampments to bury those who had died during the day, and in the morning to bury those who had died during the night. This last rite consisted in wrapping them in their blankets and covering them with two or three feet of earth. On the 3d of October, we arrived at Point Coupee. At this place the establishment of a hospital was deemed indispensable; there being no public funds, the hospital was erected by the voluntary donations of the officers. At this place upwards of a hundred men were left. On the 17th, the army reached fort Adams; here another hospital was established. The last of October they arrived at Natchez, and were immediately removed to their intended encampment. As no arrangement had been made for the procuring of a hospital, the situation of the sick still continued to be miserable; they were crowded together in tents, and lay on the bare ground, exposed to the rain and cold. A small quantity of straw was procured, but not sufficient for the twentieth part. In this situation numbers died daily. The last of November a few of the most dangerous were sent to Washington, where houses had been rented as hospitals. About the middle of December deaths began to decrease, as the greater part of those, who, on their arrival, were much reduced, had died, and the others had become convalescent. On the 18th of December, General Wilkinson was relieved by General Hampton, who adopted the most prompt measures to render the situation of the army as desirable as possible. The police of the camp, which before had been neglected, and for the want of which the camp had become extremely offensive, was immediately attended to; measures were also taken for the erection of a large and commodious hospital, and also for the payment of the troops. He advanced from his own pocket one month's pay. The troops had from four to six months' due them. Why payment had thus been delayed I cannot say. Had the men been paid on their arrival, it certainly would have been of immense advantage, as the country furnished ample supplies of vegetables and fresh provisions, which sold on reasonable terms. By returns received from the hospitals established on our ascent, it appears that most of the sick left in them died. Another cause of suffering which I before omitted to mention was the want of clothing; this was because the new clothing did not arrive till late in August, and was not delivered to the company officers until after their arrival at Washington. It will not perhaps be improper to state, that when we were opposite New Orleans, a paper was presented by a friend of General Wilkinson for the signatures of the officers. From my own impressions at that time, and I believe the impressions of others were similar to my own, I did not hesitate to sign it; the purport of this paper was the approving of the General's conduct. The General was the first military officer in the United States, of long standing, and of course carried with him the confidence of the Government. Besides, he had impressed on our minds a belief, that the misfortunes we had experienced were alone attributable to Government; that he had ever acted in conformity to orders. We could not doubt the words of our General. Many signed it.

JOHN DARRINGTON, Captain 3d Regiment Infantry.

Interrogatories put to Captain John Darrington, by the Committee, with his answers.

Question. Could boats have been procured at New Orleans sufficient to convey the troops to Fort Adams or Natchez, at any time between the 14th of June and 10th of September?

Answer. I suppose that boats could have been had. There are many boats employed in the river, and I think they might have been procured on reasonable terms.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions, particularly the flour, with which the army were supplied during the encampment at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. The flour was always bad, with the exception of one hundred barrels purchased by General Wilkinson. It was generally mouldy, sour, and frequently filled with bugs and worms. A small proportion of the pork was good, and also a small proportion of the fresh beef.

Question. Do you believe that, at the time the troops were using the bad provisions, a sufficient supply of good and wholesome provisions could have been procured at New Orleans?

Answer. I suppose it might.

Question. At what time did the fatigue duty cease?

Answer. The records of the army show it ceased on the 7th of September.

Question. Had you reason to believe there were funds in the hands of the paymaster at New Orleans, sufficient for paying off the troops?

Answer. Yes. I had command of the third regiment, and issued an order to the paymaster of that regiment, to meet us when we should arrive opposite New Orleans, and pay off the men, which he complied with.

Question. Were you provided with funds to defray incidental expenses in conveying the troops up to Natchez?

Answer. We were not. The expenses incurred whilst I had command of the army, I was obliged to defray from my own pocket.

Question. What quantity of wood-land was cleared by the troops?

Answer. I suppose about thirty acres.

Question. Do you not suppose the value of the land was enhanced by the labor done on it by the troops?

Answer. Yes. The cleared land was prepared for cultivation, and the uncleared land in the vicinity was drained by the canal and ditches in the rear of the camp.

Question. How many men did you lose out of your company during your encampment at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. None.

Question. Were your men encamped on more favorable ground than the other part of the army generally?

Answer. They were not; my company occupied its proper place in the line.

Question. How many of your men were generally fit for duty while at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. The number of those in my company fit for duty seldom exceeded five.

Question. How many of the men died on board of your boat, while ascending the river?

Answer. Of the three companies on board my boat, I think about one third died, including those left in the hospitals established on our way up.

Question. Did you receive the necessary clothing for your company?

Answer. The clothing for my company arrived at Camden, in South Carolina, during my absence. I received for it at Charleston, but being ordered for New Orleans, and not being able to get it from Camden in time, I was obliged to sail for New Orleans, leaving it behind. After my arrival at New Orleans, I wrote to the assistant military agent at Charleston, stating the situation of my company, and requesting him to forward on my clothing. He sent one cask, which I received in the month of July.

Question. Was the General attentive to the sick at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. He was particularly attentive to my company; with respect to the remainder of the army, I cannot say.

Question. Was your company provided with quarters on their arrival at New Orleans?

Answer. They were not. On my arrival, I reported myself to the commanding officer; he referred me to the military agent for quarters. I went in search of the agent, but could not find him. I sent my ensign in search of him; he informed me that he had found the agent, who directed him to look out for quarters wherever they could be procured, and he would pay for them. The ensign accordingly found quarters, and the troops were removed from the transport after a detention on board for two or three days.

Question. From the state of the army at Terre au Bœuf on the 20th of July, if preparations had immediately commenced for a removal, how soon do you believe a movement of the army up the river might have commenced?

Answer. I am of the opinion, that, if proper measures had been immediately adopted, a movement might have been made in five or six days.

Question. What were the arrangements ultimately adopted?

Answer. I think the public boats arrived from Fort Adams early in August. They were at first ordered to be repaired by general detail, but the repairs went on slowly: about the last of August, or the beginning of September, they were divided among the commanding officers of corps, who undertook to finish their repairs, which were soon completed. I reported myself ready for moving in two days after receiving my boats.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, ss.

On this 11th day of April, 1810, appeared before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for said county, Captain John Darrington, and made oath, in due form of law, that the foregoing depositions and answers to the interrogatories, are just and accurate, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

DANIEL RAPINE.

No. 7.

Deposition of Colonel Alexander Parker, taken by the Committee appointed by the House of Representatives of the United States, to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

January 30, 1809, I received orders from Gen. Wilkinson, to sail from Norfolk to New Orleans, and report myself, or take command, as the rank of the officer I found there would justify.

On the third of February, did sail with two transport ships, with about 300 troops on board; arrived and took command at New Orleans, on the 26th of March; the troops generally in good health. The General did not arrive until the 20th of April, the command, of course, then devolved on him.

A general order was issued, on the 31st of May, for the brigade quartermaster to have 50 axes, 50 spades, 50 picks, 50 mattocks, 50 hatchets, 6 briar scythes, 4 mauls, 4 pair of iron wedges, 12 handbarrows, and the same quantity of rakes, ready for service on Friday morning.

On the 1st of June, shallows were ordered to be in readiness to remove a detachment from the army, consisting of 500 men, under the command of Major Pike, with fifteen days' provisions, and all the tools mentioned in the foregoing orders, to prepare an encampment at Terre au Bœuf, for the reception of the army, as a general movement would take place in the course of a week. Accordingly, on the 9th, the troops did embark, and proceeded down the river about twelve miles, to this new encampment. On the 11th, a general order was issued at Terre au Bœuf, for a fatigue party to be daily furnished, consisting of one field officer, two captains, four subalterns, eight sergeants, eight corporals, and two hundred privates. The 5th of July, I left the encampment of Terre au Bœuf to return to the city of Washington; at which time I think there were 600 soldiers returned on the sick list—reference to the inspector's return will ascertain the exact number. The causes of such numbers being sick I attribute to the following reasons: 1st. The impurity of the waters of the Mississippi, which the soldiers were obliged to use without being filtered. 2d. The camp being mostly inundated by heavy rains and the waters from the Mississippi. 3d. The great fatigue the soldiers underwent in reclaiming that encampment, and lying on the wet ground, they not being furnished with a sufficiency either of straw or boards. 4th. The provisions that were issued by the Commissary were generally damaged and unfit for use. 5th. The great scarcity of vegetables, so conducive to the health and comfort of soldiers in that warm climate.

A. PARKER.

Interrogatories put to Colonel Alexander Parker, by the Committee appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the mortality in that detachment of the army ordered for the defence of New Orleans, with his answers.

- Question. What rank did you hold in the army at New Orleans?
 Answer. I commanded the army from the time of my arrival until the arrival of Gen. Wilkinson; from which time, until I left the army at Terre au Bœuf, I was during in command.
- Question. What was the condition of the army during their stay at New Orleans, both as it respects their health and accommodations?
 Answer. The troops generally arrived there in good health, but sickness soon commenced, and rapidly increased amongst them; their accommodations, as to barracks and quarters, were comfortable; the provisions, flour, pork, and beef, were generally bad, of the meanest kind, and unfit for use.
- Question. Was there a sufficiency of sound and wholesome provisions in New Orleans, which might have been procured for the support of the troops?
 Answer. There was generally a supply in the market of good and wholesome provisions, particularly flour and pork.
- Question. Did the market of New Orleans furnish an abundance of fresh provisions and vegetables?
 Answer. The fresh provisions were generally poor, the vegetables were abundant.
- Question. Did you examine the site of encampment at Terre au Bœuf before the troops removed there?
 Answer. I had passed by the place in going up the river, but never examined it with a view to an encampment.
- Question. Were you, or any other of the officers within your knowledge, ever consulted as to the propriety of fixing on Terre au Bœuf as the place of encampment?
 Answer. I was not, nor do I believe that any of the officers were.
- Question. Did you consider Terre au Bœuf as an eligible position for an encampment with a view to the defence of New Orleans, if the position had been a healthy one?
 Answer. The position is not a military one, but is as much so as any other in that low country.
- Question. Do you believe a healthy situation might have been selected in the high lands, and which would have been equally or more advantageous with a view to the defence of New Orleans?
 Answer. I believe the situation of the present encampment at Washington may be considered, as a military position, in every point of view, more eligible, and better calculated, for the defence of New Orleans, than Terre au Bœuf, or any other in that country, within the jurisdiction of the United States. I have many reasons for thinking so, among which the following may be considered as the principal: an invading army landing on the Mobile and taking possession of the heights of the Mississippi, could easily cut off all supplies from New Orleans; and, with a small naval force at the mouth of the Mississippi, would block up the low country so completely, as to render it wholly impossible for an army to subsist there. The health of the troops would be much better preserved, and they could, at any time, move down the river in three days with great facility in case of necessity.
- Question. Do you recollect whether any opinions were expressed among the officers, previous to the removal at Terre au Bœuf, relative to the superior advantages of the upper country over that position, and whether those opinions were communicated to the General?
 Answer. The officers frequently conversed among themselves on that subject, but I do not know that they communicated their opinions to the General. I pointed out the advantages which I conceived the upper country possessed to the General; he replied that he was fully apprised of the situation, but that he was limited in his orders, and could not leave New Orleans uncovered.
- Question. Do you recollect whether any opinions were expressed among the officers, while at Terre au Bœuf, in favor of the removal of the troops up the river, and whether those opinions were communicated to the General, and at what time?
 Answer. They were daily expressing such a wish to me, and often desired me to communicate their wishes to the General, and press him for a removal. I did mention to the General, about the last of June, or the first of July, the necessity of removing the troops from that encampment to the upper country; his reply was nearly similar to the one he gave me before—that he was restricted in his powers, and could not leave New Orleans uncovered.
- Question. When you left the encampment, were the troops regularly paid up?
 Answer. According to the best of my recollection, there was not more than two months' pay due the troops generally when I left there.
- Question. Do you know whether the paymaster at New Orleans had funds in his hands for the payment of the troops?
 Answer. He informed me, some time in the month of June, that he had received a draft, and had funds in his hands. He had been in a very low state of health for some time, and remained so when I left there, which disabled him from transacting any kind of business.
- Question. Do you not think the fatigue parties were too large in proportion to the strength of the army, and that the excessive fatigue thereby imposed on the troops, contributed very much to increase the sickness and deaths?
 Answer. It is my opinion that the details for fatigue and camp duty were much too great for the well part of the troops to perform, and that it was one great cause of the mortality.
- Question. Were the ditches and other improvements made in the camp absolutely necessary for the accommodation of the troops?
 Answer. They were certainly of great service in draining the ground, and making it more dry and comfortable.
- Question. Do you think the work done by the troops rendered the land more valuable to the proprietor?
 Answer. There can be no doubt but its value was improved by draining and clearing it.
- Question. In what state did you find the ground intended for the encampment?
 Answer. The ground on which the right wing of the army was encamped had once been cleared, but was covered with brambles and underwood. On the left it was a perfect bog, and uncleared.
- Question. Was there time sufficient for the camp forming party, under Major Pike, to have completed the preparations for encampment, previous to the removal of the main body to Terre au Bœuf?
 Answer. I think there was not. He moved with his party on the first of June, and the main body moved on the ninth. It would have taken the party under his command a month or six weeks to put the ground in any tolerable order.

Question. Was not the place chosen for encampment much infested with mosquitoes, &c.?

Answer. It was. The mosquitoes, gnats, and reptiles, were so numerous, as to be very distressing to the men, and was a great aggravation of their other sufferings.

Question. Were the troops supplied with the necessary hospital stores?

Answer. They were not, and the troops suffered much in consequence of the want of them. Many of the men died without having received any aid from hospital stores.

Question. Was it not within the power of the General to order the military agent to furnish the necessary hospital stores and other supplies for the use of the troops?

Answer. The General may at all times draw on the military agent for any quantity of stores that may be found necessary for the use of the troops.

Question. Do you know whether the military agent had funds in his hands to meet such drafts?

Answer. About the last of April, he had considerable funds in his hands. I cannot say what his disbursements were after that period.

Question. What were the most prevalent diseases in the army while you were there?

Answer. Dysenteries and diarrhoea. These disorders were increased by the dampness of the ground on which the troops were encamped.

Question. Were the waters of the Mississippi considered as wholesome?

Answer. When filtered, the water is considered as wholesome, but, in the state in which the men were obliged to use it, it was considered by medical men as very unwholesome.

Question. Could not the men have been supplied with a sufficient quantity of filtered water?

Answer. A sufficient quantity of filtering stones could not have been had, but a good substitute might have been found in sand or charcoal.

Question. Were the sentries provided with the necessary shelters to preserve them from the effects of the sun, rain, and dews?

Answer. They were not, during my stay there. There were sentinels who fell on their posts from the effects of the sun, or other cause, and expired very suddenly.

Question. Is it your opinion that a sufficient number of boats could at any time have been procured at New Orleans, for the purpose of conveying the troops up the river?

Answer. At all times, a number of boats might have been procured, but whether in sufficient numbers to have removed all the troops at once, I am not able to say.

Question. Is it your opinion that the troops might have been encamped on the plains of the Fauxbourg St. Mary, and that, if they had been so encamped, their situation would have been more eligible than it was at Terre au Boeuf.

Answer. I am under the impression that the ground would not have been sufficiently extensive for an encampment. If it would, it possessed many advantages, such as its being drier, and the facility of procuring vegetables and other necessary supplies; but I am under the impression, that, from its vicinity to the town, it would have been impossible to have restrained the men, and prevented them from entering into all the vices common in large towns.

Question. Was the police of the camp such as to keep it sufficiently clean?

Answer. The police officers were sufficiently strict; but the low situation of the ground caused a frequent overflowing of the sinks, and produced a very great stench, which was extremely offensive throughout the camp.

Question. In the state in which the army was, at Terre au Boeuf, do you believe it could have made any serious opposition against even a small invading force?

Answer. It is my opinion that our troops were so emaciated and reduced by sickness, the climate, and the want of proper nourishment, that they could have made but a very feeble opposition, against even a small military force, in good health and well organized.

Question. Were the mosquito bars or nets necessary for the troops, particularly for the sick, and were they provided?

Answer. Nets were absolutely necessary for the accommodation of the army. When I left that country a few nets were provided for the sick at the New Orleans Hospital. I was informed by the military agent, that he either had in hand ten thousand dollars, for the purpose of purchasing mosquito nets, or that he was ordered by the Secretary of War to provide for the army, at New Orleans, to the amount of ten thousand dollars.

Question. What was the price of mosquito nets?

Answer. Good nets for the soldiers might have been purchased for two dollars and fifty cents.

Question. Did any cause or causes exist, within your knowledge, to impose an imperious duty on the commander to encamp in the vicinity of New Orleans?

Answer. None within my knowledge.

Question. Were there any symptoms of discontent manifested at New Orleans, which could require the detention of the army at Terre au Boeuf?

Answer. The citizens of New Orleans were peaceable, and appeared to be well disposed to the Government. I heard of no dissatisfaction, nor murmurs of any kind.

Question. Did any reasonable apprehensions exist, from the influx of refugees from Cuba, that could require the presence of an army?

Answer. No apprehensions were entertained that I heard of. I had none.

Question. Admitting that symptoms of discontent had been manifested, would not an encampment of the army in the high lands have given to the Government the surest and most certain means of overthrowing any thing like opposition?

Answer. I am decidedly of opinion, that, as a military position, the high lands, in every point of view, may be considered as the most eligible for the protection and defence of New Orleans, and that the encampment of the army, in the higher country, would afford the most certain means of quelling any thing like opposition to the Government.

Question. Were you informed that an order had been given by the Secretary of War, on the 30th of April, 1809, for the removal of the troops to the rear of Fort Adams, or Natchez?

Answer. I heard of no such order; nor was information of such an order communicated to the army.

Question. Is it not customary for the commanding officer of an army to consult his officers of highest rank upon matters of importance, respecting the disposition of the army under his command?

Answer. It is.

On this 14th day of April, 1810, appeared before the subscriber, a justice of the peace of Washington County, Colonel Alexander Parker, and made oath, in due form of law, that the foregoing deposition, and answers to interrogatories, are just and accurate, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Sworn before,

DANIEL RAPINE.

No. 8.

Interrogatories put to Captain E. Williams, by the committee appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army ordered for the defence of New Orleans, with his answers.

Question. What rank did you hold in the army at New Orleans?

Answer. I held the rank of captain, and acted as an aid-de-camp to General Wilkinson, from the 16th of January, 1809, to the 30th of June following. I arrived at New Orleans on the 19th of April, 1809.

Question. What was the condition of the army during their stay at New Orleans, both as it respected their health and accommodations?

Answer. The accommodations were good and comfortable. Soon after the arrival of the troops they were afflicted with diarrhoea, supposed to be owing to the medicinal properties of the water of the Mississippi. The water generally produces such effects on strangers. The sickness increased during the continuance of the troops at New Orleans.

Question. Was there a sufficiency of sound and wholesome provisions at New Orleans, which might have been procured for the support of the troops?

Answer. No doubt but that a sufficiency of sound and wholesome provisions might have been purchased there at any time.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions furnished the army?

Answer. Whilst at New Orleans I was uninformd of any thing relating to this question, as I then acted as an aid-de-camp to the commander of the army. When I took my station in the line, I had frequent occasion to complain of the provisions; they were often unfit for use; our complaints were known to the General. In some instances the provisions were condemned, and others purchased by order of the General. One hundred barrels of flour were purchased by the General.

Question. Do you believe a healthy situation might have been selected in the high lands, and which would have been equally, or more, advantageous with a view to the defence of New Orleans?

Answer. A more healthy situation might have been taken in the high lands, but not so eligible for the defence of New Orleans.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the country above New Orleans, and the positions best calculated for military sites?

Answer. I am not.

Question. Do you recollect whether any opinions were expressed among the officers, while at Terre au Bœuf, in favor of the removal of the troops up the river, and whether those opinions were communicated to the General, and at what time?

Answer. The officers frequently expressed opinions in favor of a removal to the high country. Their opinions were known to the General.

Question. Were the troops regularly paid?

Answer. They were not regularly paid. When I left the detachment at Washington, Mississippi territory on the 27th of November, the regiment to which I was attached had arrears due for five months.

Question. Do you think the fatigue parties were too large, in proportion to the strength of the army, and that the excessive fatigue thereby imposed on the troops contributed very much to increase the sickness and deaths?

Answer. I do think they were.

Question. Were the ditches, and other improvements made in the camp, absolutely necessary for the accommodation of the troops?

Answer. Ditches were absolutely necessary for the comfort of the troops; the ditches made were unnecessarily large for a temporary cantonment.

Question. Do you think that the work done by the troops rendered the land more valuable to the proprietor?

Answer. I do; inasmuch as it rendered a portion of the land, on which we encamped, fit for cultivation, which land, previous to our encampment, was in its primitive state—wet and marshy.

Question. In what state did you find the ground intended for encampment?

Answer. Part of it had been cultivated, but was overgrown with weeds and brush; the remainder was in its primitive state—low, wet, and marshy, which, when ditched and cleared, became dry.

Question. Was there time sufficient for the camp forming party, under Major Pike, to have completed the preparations for encampment, previous to the removal of the main body to Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. I do not think the time was sufficient. When the main body of the army arrived, more than half of the work was to be done.

Question. Was not this place chosen for encampment much infested with mosquitoes, &c.?

Answer. Yes, it was; but not more so than that country generally is.

Question. Were the troops supplied with the necessary hospital stores?

Answer. The troops were, in my opinion, at no time sufficiently supplied with hospital stores.

Question. What were the most prevalent diseases in the army while you were there?

Answer. Dysenteries, bilious fevers, agues and fevers, and the scurvy.

Question. Could not the men have been supplied with a sufficient quantity of filtered water?

Answer. The men could have been supplied with a sufficient quantity of filtered water; the means of filtering it being in abundance.

Question. Were the sentries provided with the necessary shelters to preserve them from the effects of the sun, rain, and dew?

Answer. The sentries were at no time properly protected from the weather; about the middle of July, sheds were erected, but they afforded little protection.

Question. Is it your opinion that a sufficient number of boats could, at any time, have been procured at New Orleans, for the purpose of conveying the troops up the river?

Answer. Comfortable boats could have been procured, at any time, at New Orleans for the conveyance of the troops.

Question. Is it your opinion that the troops might have been encamped on the plains of the Faubourg St. Mary, and that if they had been so encamped, their situation would have been more eligible than it was at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. I do not think they could have been encamped there so advantageously as at Terre au Bœuf; the vicinity to New Orleans tempting the men to dissipation and other vices.

Question. Was the police of the camp such as to keep it sufficiently clean?

Answer. The detail for police was sufficient, and the camp kept as clean as the nature of the ground would admit; the frequent rains causing the sinks to overflow, contributed to the diseases of the camp.

Question. In the state in which the army was, at Terre au Bœuf, do you believe it could have made any serious opposition against a small invading force?

Answer. The extreme disease of our camp would have made it impossible for us efficiently to oppose even a small force.

Question. Were mosquito bars or nets necessary for the troops, particularly the sick, and were they provided?

Answer. I consider mosquito bars absolutely necessary for both the sick and the well. A few were supplied, at a late season, for the sick.

Question. Did any cause, or causes, exist, within your knowledge, to impose an imperious duty on the commander to encamp in the vicinity of New Orleans?

Answer. I do not know any cause why the troops were kept in the vicinity of New Orleans. The idea generally prevailed among the officers, that it was in conformity to the wishes of Government.

Question. Were there any symptoms of discontent manifested at New Orleans, which would require the detention of the army at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. I know of none that could require the detention of the whole detachment. In my opinion it was politic to leave a small portion of the army there, as the influx of people from Cuba excited disquiet in the town.

Question. Were you informed that an order had been given, by the Secretary of War, on the 30th of April, 1809, for the removal of the troops to the rear of Fort Adams, or Natchez?

Answer. I knew of no order for the removal of the troops until about the 20th of August, 1809.

In addition to the interrogatories, put by the committee, it may be proper to add, that, on or about the 1st of September, the troops were ordered, by General James Wilkinson, to prepare for a removal to the high lands up the river Mississippi. The troops left Terre au Bœuf, by detachments, between the 8th and 18th of September. On the 20th they were concentrated opposite New Orleans; many of the boats, furnished for our conveyance, were found to be in a leaky condition, some few totally unfit for service; on the 23d we halted about a mile above the city to repair, and in order to remove such of the sick to the hospital at New Orleans as were too ill to be moved. Many were forced to proceed from a want of room in the hospital, and who might have been recovered could they have had rest and comfortable lodgings. At no time was there a sufficiency of hospital stores during our route. Our surgeons often complained of a want of the proper medicines, and such as they had frequently proved inefficacious, as the sick were necessarily exposed to the heat of the sun, and the heavy dews at night, together with every variety of weather: Straw not being furnished, as expressly ordered by the War Department, the sick and the well lay on the ground with a single blanket. The sufferings of the men may be better imagined than related. The number of sick continued to increase—deaths became more numerous. At Point Coupee it was judged necessary to establish an hospital, in which were left the most dangerous of our sick, (who, for their necessaries and comforts, were dependent on the charity of the officers, as the detachments were without public funds) in number about one hundred. At Fort Adams a similar step was found necessary: as the diseases of the climate affected all, we were often deprived of the services of our surgeons, and men were known to die without the smallest medical assistance. The troops arrived at Natchez, about the 1st of November, and were immediately removed to Washington, where the change of air was soon observed to have a happy effect on the health of the men. General Wilkinson was generally attentive to the sick, particularly to my company.

WILLIAM E. WILLIAMS,

Captain of the fifth regiment of Infantry.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, April 17, 1810.

Captain William E. Williams made oath before me, that the foregoing statement, in answer to the queries put to him, so far as he states them on his own personal knowledge, is true, and so far as he states it to have been derived from the information of others, he believes to be true.

ROBERT BRENT, Mayor of the City of Washington.

No. 9.

Interrogatories put to Lieutenant Enos Cutler, by the committee appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army appointed for the defence of New Orleans, with his answers.

Question. What rank did you hold in the army?

Answer. First lieutenant in the seventh regiment of infantry.

Question. How long have you been in the army?

Answer. I have been in service since the 3d of May, 1808.

Question. At what time did you arrive at New Orleans?

Answer. I arrived there on the last day of March, 1809.

Question. What was the condition of the army during their stay at New Orleans, both as it respects their health and accommodations?

Answer. After we arrived at New Orleans the dysentery soon became very prevalent among the troops. The accommodations were good. The company under my command (the captain being sick and absent) arrived in good health, but soon became sickly, and six or seven men died before we removed to Terre au Bœuf.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions with which the troops were supplied while at New Orleans?

Answer. Our meat was good; the flour sometimes good, and sometimes bad.

Question. Was there a sufficiency of sound and wholesome provisions in New Orleans, which might have been procured for the support of the troops?

Answer. I knew very little respecting the state of the provisions in the market at New Orleans, but I do not think that a supply of good flour could at all times have been had.

Question. Did the market of New Orleans furnish a sufficient supply of fresh provisions and vegetables?

Answer. It furnished, I believe, at all times a sufficiency of vegetables, but whether a sufficiency of fresh provisions could at all times have been had, I cannot say.

Question. At what time did you remove from New Orleans to Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. It was on the third day of June. I went with the first detachment under the command of Major Pike.

Question. In what condition did you find the ground allotted for the encampment?

Answer. The ground on the right was dry and covered with weeds; towards the left it was lower, and somewhat wet, and covered with brush, blackberry bushes, &c. The party under Major Pike encamped on the right, and when the other troops came down, the line was extended to the left.

Question. At what time did the main body of troops arrive at Terre au Bœuf, and was the encampment prepared for their reception?

Answer. I believe it was eight or ten days after our arrival. The ground was as well prepared as the time would permit.

Question. How long after their arrival was it before the troops were provided with flooring for their tents?

Answer. They were provided immediately after the arrival of the main body; the boats in which they descended were broken up for that purpose.

Question. Was the place at which the troops were encamped much infested by mosquitoes?

Answer. It was, like the rest of that country, very much infested by them.

Question. Were the troops supplied with the necessary hospital stores and medicines?

Answer. I heard no complaint for the want of medicine, but there was a want of hospital stores.

Question. Do you not suppose the fatigue parties were too large in proportion to the strength of the army, and that the fatigue thereby imposed on the troops tended to increase the sickness and deaths?

Answer. On our first arrival the fatigue parties were large; they were afterwards reduced. I do not know that the sickness or deaths were increased by the fatigue.

Question. At what time were the fatigue parties reduced?

Answer. I cannot remember.

Question. Were the sentries provided with the necessary shelters to protect them from the sun, rain, and dews?

Answer. Yes, they were provided with shelters covered with palmettoes, sufficiently tight to protect them from common rains.

Question. At what time were they so provided?

Answer. I think it was probably toward the last of July, but I am not certain as to the time.

Question. What was the quality of the provisions with which the troops were supplied while encamped at Terre au Bœuf?

Answer. Our meat was generally fresh, and generally good; our flour sometimes bad. A purchase of flour was once made by order of the General, in consequence of the failure of the contractor to supply the troops.

Question. Was the police of the camp such as to keep it sufficiently clean?

Answer. Great attention was paid to the police of the camp by the officers, but the troops being new, the camp did not preserve that clean appearance which a camp of old soldiers probably would.

Question. Were the ditches which were made by the army necessary for the accommodation of the troops?

Answer. I conceived them to be so.

Question. Do you recollect whether any opinions were expressed among the officers, while at Terre au Bœuf, in favor of the removal of the troops up the river, and whether those opinions were communicated to the General, and at what time?

Answer. There were opinions of that kind expressed, and I believe they were communicated to the General early in July.

- Question. Were the troops well clothed while at Terre au Bœuf?
- Answer. My company had received their year's clothing, which year did not expire with those first enlisted, until the first of July, but, being new recruits, their clothing had become much worn; and I believe this was the case with the troops generally. Some clothing was drawn in advance, by some of the officers, while at Terre au Bœuf.
- Question. Do you conceive that Terre au Bœuf is the most eligible place in that country for an encampment?
- Answer. I believe it was as much so as any place in the neighborhood of New Orleans.
- Question. What were the diseases with which the troops were afflicted while at Terre au Bœuf?
- Answer. The dysentery continued; in addition to which, they were afflicted with ague and fever, fever, and a disorder in the mouth, which was called by some physicians the scurvy, and by others by some other name.
- Question. Were the troops regularly paid?
- Answer. The law provides that, in ordinary cases, the troops shall be paid every two months. We were paid in New Orleans, up to the last of April; and in August we were paid up to the last of June. At Washington we were paid in January up to the last of December.
- Question. At what time did you hear that the General had received orders to remove the troops up the river?
- Answer. I did not hear it until a short time before we removed.
- Question. Could boats have been procured, at New Orleans, sufficient to convey the troops to Fort Adams or Natchez, at any time between the 14th of June and the 10th of September?
- Answer. I doubt whether a sufficient number of boats could have been procured, at any one time, to convey the whole of the troops at once.
- Question. How many men died out of your company while at Terre au Bœuf?
- Answer. One man only, and he went sick from New Orleans to that place.
- Question. How many men had you generally fit for duty, in your company, while at Terre au Bœuf?
- Answer. The report of duty men arose from twelve, when we first arrived there, up, I believe, as high as twenty-six, about the last of June. In July they became sickly again, and, for some time before we left the encampment, we did not report more than nine or ten.

DANIEL RAPINE.

No. 10.

Deposition of Captain Ninian Pinkney, in the first regiment of infantry, taken by the committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

- I have been in the army of the United States since February, 1801.
- I was appointed brigade inspector, and ordered to New Orleans, where I arrived on the 31st of March, 1809.
- The public buildings not being sufficient for the accommodation of but a small proportion of the troops which had arrived, and was daily arriving, they were quartered in all parts of the city and faubourgs, in comfortable houses. The sick reports soon became very considerable; and I understood the diseases to be chiefly the dysentery, which attacks all strangers, and of which a number of the men died. The provisions issued to the troops were salted pork and beef, bread, and flour, which I have understood was not of the best quality; nor do I believe good flour or fresh beef, in large quantities, could have been procured in the country.
- A detachment of troops, under the command of Major Pike, left New Orleans, on the 3d of June, for Terre au Bœuf, to prepare the ground for an encampment, and the remainder of the army went down on the 9th and 10th of the same month; at which time I went, and found the ground as well prepared as the short time given them would permit, but some small underwood, briars, and weeds, remained to be removed on each flank of the line, and ditches to be cut to carry off the water when the rainy season should come on. And, for this purpose, a general fatigue was detailed, consisting of two captains, four subalterns, and two hundred men, which was reduced in proportion as those objects were accomplished, and was entirely taken off by the 1st of August.
- The tents of the men and officers were made comfortable, by flooring them with the plank taken from the boats in which they ascended the river, and erecting sheds, covered with palmettoes, to protect them from the sun and rain; and every exertion was made by the General to establish and keep up a strict police, as can be seen by the general orders issued at that camp.
- I have heard the surgeons and surgeons' mates frequently complain of the want of hospital stores and medicines; and I have understood that the greater part of those articles used at camp Terre au Bœuf was purchased at New Orleans. The regular supply from Philadelphia did not arrive in Orleans until about the 1st of September; at which time the clothing arrived also. Some of the companies were at this time much in want of clothing; not that they had much due them, but because they had spoiled and worn it out before the expiration of the year. And it is a fact, well known in the army, that the clothing of recruits will not last them the first year, unless the officers take much care.
- I do conceive Terre au Bœuf the most eligible place for an encampment I have seen on the Mississippi, within fifty miles of New Orleans.
- The diseases with which the troops at camp Terre au Bœuf were afflicted were complicated, and of various kinds, and the physicians differed very much as to their mode of treatment.
- The troops were not paid so frequently as the law directs, but I believe as often as the nature of the service would permit.
- I do not recollect to have heard that the General had received orders to move the troops up the river, until he was making arrangements to carry it into effect, and that was about the 1st of August.
- I do not think a sufficient number of boats could have been had, at any one time, between the 14th of June and the 10th of September, to transport the troops to Natchez; indeed, I am satisfied they could not.

Questions by the Committee.

- Question. In what situation did you find the ground at Terre au Bœuf, on your arrival at that place?
- Answer. The ground at Terre au Bœuf, on which the encampment was making, had the appearance of having once been cultivated as far as the centre, from the extreme right of the line; the other part had never been cleared before, and was covered with underwood and briars, and required to be trenched to take off the rain water.
- Question. How long after your arrival at the camp was it before the tents were generally floored?
- Answer. The tents of the men were all, or nearly all, floored in eight or ten days after my arrival.
- Question. What was the quality of the provisions with which the troops were supplied at Terre au Bœuf, and what measures were taken to procure those of a better quality?
- Answer. The meat part of the ration was generally fresh beef, and as good as the country commonly affords. The bread and flour was not good, and the General made a purchase of, I think, one hundred barrels, on account of the contractor, of the best flour that could be had in the city of Orleans; but when it was issued, it was found very little better than what the contractor's agent was issuing.
- Question. Were mosquito nets, or bars, necessary for the troops, and were they provided?

Answer. Mosquito nets are necessary at all points and places on the Mississippi, from the Bluff of Natchez to the Balize, at least four months in the year; but the troops were not furnished with them, except for the sick in the hospital.

Question. Are you acquainted with the country generally in the neighborhood of New Orleans?
 Answer. I have no knowledge of the country in the neighborhood of New Orleans, at any considerable distance from the river banks, except what I have learned from others.

Question. Do you not believe the sickness and deaths were increased by the badness of the provisions, and the want of hospital stores and medicines?

Answer. I have no doubt of it.

Question. Are you acquainted with the country above New Orleans, and the positions best calculated for military sites?

Answer. I am not acquainted with the country between New Orleans and Fort Adams, back from the river. The best sites for military positions are in the neighborhood of Fort Adams and Natchez.

Question. Do you know whether any opinions were expressed among the officers in favor of a removal of the troops from Terre au Bœuf up the river, and whether those opinions were made known to the General, and at what time?

Answer. I know that opinions were expressed among the officers in favor of a removal of the troops, from camp Terre au Bœuf, up the river; and I believe those opinions were partially made known to the General, but at what time, or by whom, I cannot say.

DANIEL RAPINE.

No. 11.

Deposition of John Chrystie, First Lieutenant 6th Infantry, taken by the Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

I arrived at New Orleans on the 15th of March, 1809. The accommodations of the troops were as good as the town could afford; and the provisions were, in general, such as are usually furnished, I believe, though I recollect complaints were once or twice made and surveys held.

The market abounded with vegetables; but I do not know whether fresh provisions could have been procured in large quantities.

About a third of the troops were on the sick report some time before our movement to camp, principally with dysenteries.

About the first of June, nine strong companies (being a third of the whole) moved under the command of Major Pike, to the position at Terre au Bœuf, selected for the encampment, and the main body followed in six or eight days after.

On my arrival, about the 10th of June, I found the ground, from the extreme right to some distance to the left of the centre, dry and hard, and great part of the front covered with a firm sod, and I believe clover. Every one seemed pleased with the situation, and the men in general were highly gratified with the change.

The camp was not more infested with mosquitoes, in my opinion, than the city of New Orleans, and they were never troublesome there during the day.

The importance of having the trenches completed before the rains set in occasioned large details at first, but they decreased with the progress of the work. No labor was bestowed on them further than was necessary to the comfort of the soldiers and neatness of the camp; and I do believe, that those trenches were rather hurtful than otherwise to the plantation. Sheds for the sentries, other sheds capable of turning rain, extended between the lines of tents, from one extremity of the camp to the other; a guard house, and a large hospital, were erected with all possible despatch. The tents were floored immediately on our arrival.

The hospital department did not appear to meet perfectly the exigencies of the occasion. I do remember to have heard, at one time, considerable complaints on the score of hospital stores, and medical attendance. It must be well known, however, I believe, to every officer then in camp, that the greatest exertions were made to remedy these evils.

The provisions were generally fresh and good, except the flour; and I believe good flour was very scarce, at that time, in New Orleans.

The clothing of the troops was not in good condition, but I understood that none was due until a short time before their departure for Natchez, when it was thought best not to issue.

The most unwearied attention was paid by the General to the police of the camp; and, though, for some time, its condition showed us to be but young soldiers, it soon became perfectly neat and clean.

Of the company to which I was attached, four men died at camp; two of them of the dysentery, which, I believe, they had taken at New Orleans.

Vegetables and milk were to be had in abundance, till within a very short time before our departure, but, in general, the market did not answer expectation; a circumstance which may probably be attributed to these causes: certain articles found to be unhealthy were prohibited; prices were at one time restricted; the inhabitants, not understanding the language, frequently had difficulties with the men, and sometimes, when imposed on, could not be redressed; at the same time, the great accession of population to New Orleans, from the Spanish Islands, &c. gave them there a ready market.

I consider the position at Terre au Bœuf the most eligible for an encampment, within 100 miles of New Orleans, on the Mississippi. It is between two large well cultivated plantations; has the advantage of being immediately at the junction of the road from the Terre au Bœuf neighborhood, with the main levee road—a circumstance manifestly favorable to the market; and, at the same time, its nearness to New Orleans gave every facility of procuring extraordinary supplies.

The rear and extreme left were, on our first arrival, exceedingly wet, and covered with brushwood; but the small growth being cleared away, and the trenches dug, it soon became dry and firm.

On the 24th day of April, 1810, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for said county, appeared John Chrystie, and made oath, in due form, that the above and foregoing facts, in this affidavit, are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

No. 12.

Deposition of General James Wilkinson, April 24, 1810.

To the Honorable the committee appointed to inquire into the cause or causes of the great mortality in that detachment of the army of the United States ordered for the defence of New Orleans.

GENTLEMEN:

I deeply regret my incapacity to comprise, in this hasty report, all the causes which have induced the inquiry before you. But the circumstances of the moment will not permit that broad exposition which it is my desire to present you. Hurried from Baltimore, I left the records of my command for the last season, with other papers of consequence, on ship-board, and they have reached me too late for critical examination and comparison.

I beg leave to premise, that military history, ancient and modern, will show, that in new levied armies more men are lost by disease than by the sword. I quote the authority of Marshal Saxe, and General Washington, to justify this position; and it may also be supported by a recurrence to the mortality which attended our armies at Ticonderoga, under Major General Gates, in the year 1776, and under Major General Wayne, at his camp of Greenville, in the year 1803, in high latitudes, and salubrious climes. It is also a fact, that as great a mortality as we experienced last season, in proportion to numbers, did take place in 1801, at the camp near the mouth of the Ohio, to which Colonel Williams, of the Engineers, now in this city, can testify.

Were I required to say, in a few words, what were the chief causes of the mortality among the troops, under my command, on the waters of the Mississippi, the last season, I should ascribe much to the peculiar visitation of Providence, much to the time and manner of assembling the troops at New Orleans, and more to the sudden change from the habits of domestic life to those of the camp; from the ease and comforts of the citizen, to the hardships and exposure of the soldier; to these, however, must be added other subordinate causes, which, doubtless, contributed to exasperate our sufferings. Such were the defects of the medical and provision department, defects which I found it impossible to control, although every exertion was made to remedy them. It was in vain I sought for competent medical aid; the country did not afford it. Extravagant prices were offered for fresh beef, without effect; and flour of the best quality in New Orleans was purchased for account of the contractor, which, on examination, could scarcely be distinguished from that of our daily issues. The professional standing of the troops, too, was unfavorable to that police, which is indispensable to health in aggregated bodies. Both officers and men were green from the bosom of civil life, and had reached that stage between the armed yeomanry and the disciplined soldier, when the promptitude and enthusiasm of the citizen is lost, and a sense of veteran punctuality and subordination has not been acquired.

On the second of December, 1809, I received orders for the assembly of the troops at New Orleans, by the route of the ocean and of the western waters; and the corps were assembling at that city from the month of February until May. I arrived there the 19th of April; the vernal heat was then extreme, and I found five hundred and ninety-eight sick, nearly one-third of the whole. At that stage of the season, with such a body of sick, sound discretion and common humanity would, to an observer, have opposed the idea of attempting to mount the river, three hundred miles, under a vertical sun, and against an impetuous current; and if the sick had been left behind, the whole medical staff must also have been left to take care of them, which would have exposed the marching body to disease and death, without succor—a circumstance at once inhuman and unwarrantable.

I perceived at first glance the necessity of removing from New Orleans; but my orders being expressly to "make such a disposition of the troops as would most effectually enable me to defend that city, and its dependencies, against any invading force," it became my primary duty to seek for the position best adapted to this end, and which combined the fairest prospects of health. At this period, and for two or three weeks after, continued showers of rain kept the flat surface of the country (the earth being saturated by the spring flood) too wet for the formation of an encampment.

The interval was occupied in reconnoitering at all points for a suitable position; and, at the pressing instance of the governor of the territory, I visited Terre au Boeuf, near the English Turn, accompanied by himself, Colonel Smyth, of the rifle corps, (Colonel Parker being indisposed) and some gentlemen of the vicinity, who gave every assurance of the salubrity of the spot, founded on the experience of years, and promised us a competent market from the adjacent settlements, which extended down the river, and at right angles from it, in a direction to the eastward, for several leagues. I beg leave to refer to my letter to Governor Claiborne, and his answer, marked No. 1 and 2, for illustration of the preceding facts.

Under these circumstances, with the concurrence of those who examined the ground with me, it was fixed on for our encampment, and measures were immediately taken to remove the troops from the city. Orders were accordingly given for the march of nine companies, out of twenty-eight, on the first of June; the main body followed on the ninth, and the whole were encamped on the tenth. I wrote the Secretary of War on the 29th May, advising him of my determination, and apprising him at large of my reasons for preferring this spot. After the establishment of my camp, and on the 14th of June, I received a "conditional" order from the Secretary of War, under date of the 30th April, directing a removal of the troops from New Orleans, if they had not been removed, and recommending a position in the vicinity of Fort Adams; but, as the order was not imperative, as the mode of transport was not provided, as the movement, by the ordinary means, would have been greatly expensive, as the operation, under existing circumstances, menaced the lives of the men, and more particularly as the troops were gaining health, and general satisfaction, appeared to prevail, I replied to the Secretary, under date of the 18th June, repeating the motives which had induced the selection of the spot I occupied, and assigning reasons why the troops should be continued there. Indeed, so strongly did I apprehend the consequences which must attend the transfer of a body of men, a majority of whom were either sick or convalescent, from my camp to Fort Adams, under the heats and dews of the summer, that, had the order of the 30th April been imperative, I think I should have paused over it, until I could have reported our real condition, and received further instructions. Humanity, policy, and justice, to those entrusted to my charge, as well as to my country, would have enjoined it on me to hazard this responsibility. The event justified my fears; and it will ever be my opinion, that, if we had moved to the salt waters in our vicinity, or to the sea shore, which was not distant, we should not have suffered one-third the loss we sustained in ascending the river, and that our continuance at the encampment of Terre au Boeuf, would have been less fatal than the movement we made. The best informed inhabitants anticipated the consequences, and the opinions of our ablest surgeons were in unison with my own, as will appear from the reports of Doctors Upshaw, Thruston, and Goodlet, exhibited in the documents Nos. 3, 4, and 5.

On the 20th of July, I received a letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the 22d of June, in answer to my letter of the 29th of May. In this letter the Secretary makes reference to his "conditional" order of the 30th of April, and directed me to embark immediately "all the troops" on board the public vessels (excepting the garrisons of New Orleans and Fort St. Philip) and proceed to the high ground in the rear of Fort Adams, and the public ground in the rear of Natchez. This letter covered the copy of an order from the Secretary of the Navy to Captain Porter, directing him to furnish such vessels as could be spared from the service, for the transport of the troops. Every exertion depending on myself was instantly entered upon to carry this order into effect. But finding that the transport specifically assigned was utterly inadequate to the object; to supply the deficiency, I hired some boats, borrowed others, and repaired several belonging to the public, which had been condemned as unfit for service, and were accidentally discovered to be lying at Fort Adams. Four gunboats fell down to my camp on the eighth of September, embarked one hundred and ninety one men, and sailed the next day; and excepting a small detachment, to raise and repair a sunken boat, the last man left the ground on the 13th, on board the craft which had been employed and repaired. At this time a fever, by which I had suffered, became so violent as to confine me to my bed, and put it out of my power to accompany the troops. I followed them under a severe malady, but it was not until November that my health was restored.

The position of Terre au Bœuf, in relation to the defence of New Orleans, is the best which can be found in the country. It covers our batteries at the English Turn, and, by a sudden transition, our force may be employed to resist any approach by the Lakes on the east or west of the river. The plan submitted to the committee will, I flatter myself, give them satisfaction on this point; and, in addition to other testimony respecting the character of the spot for salubrity, and of the improvements made on it by the troops, I beg leave to offer the deposition of Mr. Delassize, No. 6, the proprietor, and a man of great respectability.

When the troops embarked, the whole of them had been paid up to the last of June, and some of them to the first of September. After that period my orders had no effect on the paymaster, who pled ill health, and his instructions to remain in New Orleans. When General Hampton relieved me, he advanced some pay to the troops from his private purse, (a thing impossible to a man who had been twenty-five years in service) and directed the Paymaster to be arrested, and sent up in custody of an officer, if he should refuse to march at forty-eight hours' notice. This step had the desired effect, but it was too strong a one for me to take.

No question can be made as to the correctness of the motives which directed the transfer of the troops to the upper country. It will occur to every man's observation, that, in general, a high country must be healthier than a low one; yet every person must be sensible that this, like all other rules, is liable to exception. This observation is sanctioned by the authority of Doctor Seip, a respectable man and able physician at Natchez, whose report, under cover, No. 7, will prove that district of country to have been more sickly the last season than for twenty years past. Upon the whole, we have been unfortunate, not culpable. The best evidence I can offer of my conduct, in what concerned the sick, will be found in the enclosed testimonial of the medical staff, No. 8, which was handed to me after I had transferred the command of the department to Brigadier General Hampton, and was about to leave the country. I throw myself upon the candor and the justice of the committee to pardon me for observing, that I have seen, from the public prints, that the arts and intrigues of my enemies, co-operating with a current of prejudice, have perverted and misrepresented, to my injury, the scenes to which this report has reference. The tales of ignorant, discontented, seditious, and worthless subalterns, and the fictions and falsehoods of my personal and political enemies, have been industriously circulated to wound my character; but being conscious that, in this, as in every other instance of public service, I have done, and more than done my duty, I court inquiry, and defy investigation.

To these facts and statements I am willing to depose; and with the highest consideration and respect for those whom I address,

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, ss.

On this 24th of April, 1810, before the subscriber, a justice of the peace for said county, appeared James Wilkinson, and made oath, in due form, that the foregoing facts, as stated, are true, to the best of his knowledge, recollection, and belief.

PAPERS ACCOMPANYING THE DEPOSITION OF GENERAL WILKINSON.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to Governor Claiborne.

"CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, July 27, 1809.

"SIR: As much clamor has been made with respect to the merits of this position, in point of its health and fitness, I take the liberty to address you on the subject.

"And as you offered me the first suggestion in its favor, I will thank you to inform me whether you did not reconnoitre the site before I determined to adopt it for my encampment, and afterwards reiterate to me your recommendation of it? In addition to the sanction of your opinion, I believe it is within your knowledge, that the most ancient and respectable inhabitants of the country concur with you in sentiment. But as you have also seen the encampment since it was formed and improved, I shall be obliged by the avowal of your opinion of its present appearance and salubrity."

Extract of a letter from Governor Claiborne to General Wilkinson, dated

"NEW ORLEANS, July 28, 1809.

"I received your letter of yesterday. My opinion is now, and always has been, that the position you occupy, at the commencement of the English Turn, is the most eligible one, for such troops as may be designed, to give protection to the city of New Orleans. It has, moreover, been represented to me, by several of the old inhabitants, (and from my own observation, I do not doubt the fact) to be as healthy as any site on the Mississippi, between Baton Rouge and the Balize.

"I did, therefore, after having myself viewed the spot, which I found to be more elevated than the land on the Mississippi generally is, advise you to fix your summer cantonment at that place; and I am now persuaded, from the great care which is taken to keep the ground dry, to defend the men from the influence of the sun, and to lodge them comfortably, that the number of your sick will daily diminish."

A report on the diseases of the camp Terre au Bœuf, their causes, characters, and mode of treatment.

CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, July 20, 1809.

The diseases which are now prevalent among the men in camp, are chronic diseases, bilious and intermitting fevers, some cases of scurvy. The chronic diarrhoea was first introduced by the change of aliment, and the use of the Mississippi water; which water is strongly impregnated with calcareous earth and carbonate of lime. Many of the men were violently attacked before their arrival at New Orleans with diarrhoea, from the use of the water when on their route up the river. On the first arrival of the troops at New Orleans this disease was common, almost universal; generally speaking, the disease proved fatal, or yielded to treatment, before our encampment was formed; but, even now, many are found lingering in the last stage of cold diarrhoea, of from three to four months standing. It may safely be affirmed that three-fourths of the deaths in camp have been from this disease.

The bilious and intermitting fevers are more common in camp than they were in Orleans; but of the number of cases I have seen there has been no one attended with violent or fatal symptoms in the first stage, and appear to yield readily to the depleting plan of treatment. These diseases belong to the climate and territory of Orleans; and are, I believe, less violent in this camp than at Orleans. The bills of mortality are greater at Orleans, in proportion to the population, than here, notwithstanding the disadvantages we are of necessity compelled to encounter.

The scurvy exists in a few cases, but is not to be feared, as we can command vegetable food and acids. The men, when sick, living on the rations, is, no doubt, the cause of the scurvy.

Ample reason will be found, in the imperfect state of the medical staff, and want of capacity in many who compose that staff; in the want of a hospital, hospital stores, and medicines, for the mortality of the soldiery. When the hospital, which is now building, shall be finished, when each medical man shall have his duties well defined, and those of the best capacity placed in situations the most responsible and dangerous, if the military agent should receive such instructions as would enable him to supply the sick with such hospital stores and medicines as are necessary, I feel assured of the truth I now assert, that our deaths would be lessened three-fourths.

The additional expense ought not to be calculated, where the lives and health of the troops are concerned; but, by stopping the ration of the sick man this expense will be very small. It is a distressing sight, and truly unpleasant to the feelings of the medical man, to be in attendance on the sick soldier, and see him die for the want of proper food and medicines; humanity mourns over such a sight. Justice, policy, and patriotism, require this allowance and liberality from Government. It is a fact that there is not one dollar of public money which can be had to purchase milk or vegetables in camp; many are, of course, suffering for necessaries, which might be bought for a few shillings. The commutation of the ration would be sufficient for this purpose.

There are many sick men in camp who cannot be moved, however desirable it might be, even to the hospital in Orleans. They came here sick, have grown worse, and are now on the brink of the grave. Transporting them, in this hot climate, would be certain death.

CAMP, TERRE AU BŒUF, July 29, 1809.

SIR:

In pursuance of your request, I proceed to give you a report of the sick at this place, together with the several diseases, and my opinion as respects the site of this encampment. I feel a difficulty in draughting this report, as no doubt there must be contained in it many subjects which require a more full and free investigation than my health and time will allow me to allot to the performance. Should any inaccuracies appear on the face of it, I trust your goodness of heart, and your good sense, will lead you to pass them over in silence.

On the 4th of July I arrived at this camp, and found great numbers on the sick reports; some laboring under dysentery, some with bilious remitting fevers, and others with scurvy, though small in proportion. Those afflicted with dysentery were very much reduced when I first saw them, and almost all of them died. I was induced to make inquiry into the circumstances of this disease; I found it was generally subsequent to bilious fever, and that very few cases of this complaint commenced with the usual symptoms which attend it in the first instance. Some new cases of dysentery have come immediately under my care, which, when taken in time, have nearly yielded to medicine and such diet as was proper for them. I think the disease on the decline, and I do not dread the recurrence, unless some material change in the season should predispose the constitution of the soldiery to take it. There are circumstances that might render this fatal disease epidemic; and I dread them much. But a good market, with such hospital and medical stores as may be necessary, not too many of the men confined together, avoiding the night air and dews, will, in a great measure, obviate the apprehensions and danger.

There are but few cases of bilious remitting fever now under my care. They are very obstinate, and when they do yield to medicine, the patient is often attacked when extremely debilitated by diarrhoea, and carried off without fever or any other distressing symptom.

The intermitting fever is now the most prevalent complaint in camp. Some, when apparently on the recovery, are suddenly taken with dysentery and diarrhoea, which terminates in death or extreme debility. This disease often alternates (as I have often seen) from fever to dysentery and diarrhoea, and from the two latter to the former, many times in the week. Such cases are dangerous, and I find great difficulty in their treatment. The bark loses its effect in a few days, and, indeed, often produces nausea and disgust very disagreeable to the patient. I find antimonials in small doses, and repeated blisterings to the extremities, of great service. I, this day, commenced with different preparations of arsenic, and have great hopes of the success. The scurvy has made its appearance; several have died with it. It has increased considerably within ten days, and I fear that the progress will be difficult to arrest. In some cases, the rapid march astonished me. Every effort that I made towards relief and cure was fruitless, (though this was not always the case) and my prescriptions appeared to have no effect in alleviating the miseries of the suffering patient. This disease wears a peculiar character, and differs, in my estimation, from that disease described in different authors. The continuance of fresh provision, constant supplies of vegetables, and a strict adherence to cleanliness, will prevent its spreading through camp. I feel the more confident in the opinion, from the circumstance that no officer in the line has had it. The sick reports of four companies, which I attend, have enlarged considerably, though, in the increase, but few dangerous cases have occurred. I see no reason to believe that any thing like an epidemic rages in camp. I fear the approaching season will bring upon us some distressing and fatal disorders, that will pay no respect to persons. My fears on this head, I trust, may be imaginary.

The situation of this camp I believe to be the best on the Mississippi, in any part of this country: I draw this opinion, not from an acquaintance with the sites, but from the judgment and opinions of the best informed men with whom I have conversed on the subject. I do not think our situation could be bettered at this season of the year. The danger of a removal at this period, I think hazardous in the extreme—I mean a removal to any distance where the troops would be obliged to be conveyed in small vessels by water, and contending against a strong and difficult current. When I give this opinion, I wish to be understood that I allude to a removal in the hot months. As soon as the weather will permit, I do think it would be endangering the lives of the soldiery to continue them here.

The above sketch is given upon mature reflection, backed upon some experience, and not biased by party or prejudice. I trust it will meet your approbation, and accord with your sentiments.

I have the honor to remain, with high regard, esteem, and respect, your very obedient humble servant, &c.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1810.

SIR:

I should do injustice to yourself, and violence to my own feelings, were I to permit your Excellency to leave this territory without giving you my sentiments, as respects Camp Terre au Bœuf, and the march from that place to our present situation. Circumstances relative to my professional calls precluded the possibility of affording this testimonial to your Excellency, at, perhaps, a more seasonable time.

The calls of my worthy friend Colonel Russell, then lying on the bed of sickness at New Orleans, prevented my doing the task which I now present for your perusal.

As a member of the medical staff, and who was amongst the earliest of those who arrived at New Orleans, I could not fail to observe the different and varied changes of the diseases which have occurred in the army. From dire necessity I was obliged to attend to every corps in the line, save the light artillery, and I trust you will excuse me when I say I could not fail to have an accurate knowledge of the situation of every company in the line. At the period when our movement was spoken of and contemplated, I do not for a moment hesitate to declare, that the men were on the recovery. The thoughts of a remove or ascent up the Mississippi, made me tremble for their fate, and the more so, when I recognized the debilitated situation of the soldiery, consequent to the climate in which they were exposed. Let me here observe (and I flatter myself I am correct in the assertion) that the troops were evidently on the recovery, and at that time, too, which was all important to every individual who composed our army. It has always been my opinion (and I have seen nothing to induce me to alter it) that hundreds of men were lost by the movement from the Camp Terre au Boeuf, that otherwise might have now been alive. Believe me, sir, when I tell you, our march was premature by many, very many weeks: for, as the men were evidently on the recovery, a little time would have rendered them more capable to undertake and brave the hardships which stared them in the face. These hardships have occurred, they have been experienced and sorely felt, under circumstances, when affliction and disease had enervated every fibre in their system. But the soldiery were not the only people in this territory who had the prevailing diseases of our camp. From careful inquiry I find the citizens on the Mississippi in the same unhappy situation; and it was observed by many old and well informed inhabitants, that the country had not been so sickly for a number of years. In truth I believe that the same fate would have attended us had our situation been any where else on the river. The despondency of mind attending necessarily young troops, adding to that the distance from relatives and friends, and the very bad fare from inexperience in the culinary way, was at least as injurious to the men as the local situation of the camp.

The limits of a letter will not permit me to enlarge on this subject. I now, sir, bid you farewell. May the services you have rendered your country be long remembered by a grateful people, and be a solace and comfort to you in your last moments.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

A. G. GOODLET.

Deposition of Mr. Delassize.

MARCH 10, 1810.

The undersigned, Jean Delassize, a native and inhabitant of Louisiana, being forty-three years of age, on his oath declareth, that he is, and has been for four years, the proprietor of the ground at Terre au Boeuf, which was occupied by the troops under the command of General Wilkinson the past season: that no proposition was ever made to him, by or for General Wilkinson, directly or indirectly, respecting the purchase of said place, or any part of it; that no levee, or any part of one, was erected by the troops encamped on said ground, nor any other works made on it, but such as appeared necessary to the comfort of said troops; that said ground adjoined the cane field of this deponent, and that no clearing or other improvements was made on said ground to prepare it for cultivation; that the trenches and ditches, cut to keep the camp dry, were rather injurious than beneficial to the tillage of the ground, a large proportion of which was covered by clover, far before the troops came to it; that the accommodations made and materials brought to the ground for the use of the troops, were sold at public vendue for the account of the United States; and that, for the pasturage furnished the public horses, for the timber and fuel used, and damages sustained during the occupancy of three months, the deponent received the sum of six hundred and forty dollars and thirty-four cents only.

The undersigned further declares that he has resided at the same place, and adjacent to the said camp, with a population of more than sixty souls, during the space of years, and that, from his observation and experience, he considers it as healthy a spot as any in the vicinity of New Orleans.

NATCHEZ, February 15, 1810.

General Wilkinson will please excuse the delay of my reply to his favor of the ninth instant, when I assure him that nothing but want of time prevented it sooner.

Very respectfully, sir, yours, &c.

F. SEIP.

The diseases most predominant during the last and preceding seasons, in this country, as far as it has come within my knowledge, were fevers of the intermitting and remitting kind, cholera, dysentery, and catarrh. The mortality attending these complaints is by no means great, in comparison with the numbers attacked. A cause of this, no doubt, is the tendency most diseases here have to run into the intermitting state; a form of all others most immediately under the control of medicine, and one by which time is allowed to obviate a recurrence of the diseases. The violence of intermitting diseases at the same time being chiefly exerted upon the spleen and other abdominal viscera, unless arrested in time, impair the constitution, and thereby lay the foundation for other disorders, which, though slow, eventually destroy life.

The aptitude every form of disease has to run into that state, is so great, that peripneumonia, catarrh, ophthalmia, and even rheumatic affections, frequently partake of it, and very often require bark and other tonics to complete the cure.

The last epidemic we experienced in this country, was the influenza of the autumn of 1807, which commenced with the month of November, and continued during the greater part of that winter. Pleuritic symptoms combining with the influenza, contribute much to increase its mortality. A remarkable change in the character of that disease (pleurisy) took place at that period; cases occurring where it became necessary to use the lancet as freely as it ever is done in the Eastern States. Something of the same nature I think I have remarked in this disease often since, depletion being necessary to a much greater extent than I had seen it used previous to that year, and some of them in newly arrived Africans. Catarrhs have prevailed at different periods since, but not to so great a degree in force or extent. Some few cases, it ought to be observed, of that complaint, the last autumn, were strongly marked in their symptoms, such as accompanied the influenza of the year 1807. These were collections of matter in the antrum and frontal sinus; symptoms most characteristic of that disease, followed by the peculiar foetid discharge from those cavities. Some instances have occurred, when the abscess was seated in the lungs; unattended, however, with hectic fever; the discharge as foetid, soon, as in the other cases, relieved itself, and a speedy convalescence followed.

The only endemic disease of the past season was the intermitting fever; and so prevalent was it, that I have been frequently assured that nothing equal to it has been experienced for twenty years. This is ascribed, and with much probability, to the extreme rise of the Mississippi, covering the low grounds, and retiring during the summer.

How far the influence of its banks and the adjacent low grounds on the western side of that river extends eastward, is yet undecided; but that it does, for a great distance, is evident from the similarity of the diseases of both countries. The diseases, in fact, of all the high lands in this neighborhood, are properly such as are generated upon low and marshy situations; many artificial causes, it is true, increase the evil, such as clearing the low grounds, erecting ponds, &c. During the last summer those situations which, in former seasons, were most exempt, became very subject to the prevailing diseases. The character of this endemic differed somewhat from the same disease of other years; a deep sighing was a very constant symptom of the remitting and intermitting fevers of the present year, with great pain at the pit of the stomach, and copious discharges of a dark color from the stomach and alimentary canal.

The access of the above diseases was, for the most part, preceded by a lassitude, slight rigor or chill, one or two days previous to the attack, recurring at regular periods daily, or every other day, and increasing in violence until the disease became fully marked. The chill varied in different cases, and was mostly attended by an exceeding irritable state of the stomach, or vomiting. To this succeeded the fever, which continued from six to twenty-four hours, with excruciating pain of the head, back, and pit of the stomach. When the patient was robust and of a plethoric habit, the fever frequently set in with a very slight chill, and continued for two or three days before a complete intermission took place.

What the general effect of this climate might be upon a body of men subject to military habits, &c. I could not venture to say from experience, but am inclined to think, must be very similar to that experienced by the poorer class of emigrants, who annually visit this country from above. The first effect, occasioned by intense heat, and other remote causes, upon persons of that description, discovers itself early in an attack of cholera morbus, remitting and intermitting fever, diarrhoea, or dysentery: the former are by much the most favorable forms of seasoning, as it is usually termed; the diarrhoea or dysentery are invariably the worst, and at all times, a most serious complaint. This last form of disease, no doubt, would be the one most likely to occur, where improper diet, intemperance, and frequent exposure to the sudden changes of air, take place. The difficulty of restoring the tone of the bowels after an attack of that complaint, is such, that it not unfrequently baffles every attempt of medicine, and requires a change of climate to effect it.

To guard a large body of men against the occurrence of disease, from such numerous sources, would, without doubt, be a very difficult thing to accomplish, unless their arrival could be so managed as to inure, in some measure, the constitution gradually to the change of climate. This has been sometimes attempted in introducing fresh gangs of negroes into the territory, and apparently with the happiest effect. Depletion here was substituted, and lenient exercise, for some time, together with a proper regimen, observed.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 14, 1810.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 13th, 1810.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the honorable the Senate, passed April 7th, 1810, "directing the Secretary of War to prepare a system of regulations for improving the discipline of the militia of the United States, comprehending the infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and to report the same to the Senate at the next session of Congress," the following regulations for the infantry, cavalry, and artillery, are herewith respectfully presented.

In determining on the regulations which it may be most eligible to establish for the government of the infantry, several considerations present themselves: first, the organization of companies, battalions, and regiments, as ordained by existing laws; secondly, the proficiency already made, with the experience acquired under the present system. Were the militia to be organized at this time from the population of the United States, and regulations to be adopted for their government and discipline, without regard to their present organization and discipline, the system of organization and tactics of the French armies would claim a preference. But the adoption of this system would require an entire new organization of companies, battalions, and regiments; and it is at least doubtful whether the officers of the militia would bestow gratuitously the time and attention necessary for their own, and the instruction of the men under their command, in the new and additional duties thus devolving on them.

The regulations prepared by the late Baron de Steuben, and ordered for the government of the troops of the United States by the Continental Congress, March 29th, 1779, are acknowledged to contain the necessary instructions and directions for the discipline and government of an army, and have been the general rule of practice observed by the militia as well as by the army of the United States. It has, therefore, been judged expedient to continue these regulations as a basis, and to add to them such amendments and alterations as have been suggested by experience, with some manœuvres which make a part of more modern tactics. Should this proposal be adopted, the ordinance of March, 1779, as altered and amended, will require to be reprinted.

For the government of the Cavalry.—The ordinance for the exercise and manœuvres of the light cavalry of the French armies having all the advantages and improvements derived from long experience and actual service, appears to be well calculated. In order that a judgment may be formed of its merits, a translation of the whole of that ordinance, together with a volume of plates, explanatory of the directions, is herewith transmitted. In case it shall be approved, a revision of the work, by a person conversant with military science, will be necessary, in which the terms will be rendered analogous to our language; the whole may be abbreviated, and such parts as are not applicable to light cavalry may be entirely omitted.

For the Artillery.—“A compendious exercise for garrison and field ordnance,” selected from the most approved authorities, by officers of experience, is proposed, and herewith reported for consideration.

All which is respectfully submitted.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

NOTE.—The papers referred to in this report are not now to be found.

[3d SESSION.

ESTIMATE FOR FORTIFICATIONS FOR THE YEAR 1811.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 18, 1811.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 8, 1811.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit to the committee appointed on that part of the President's message relating to the land forces and fortifications, an estimate of moneys required on account of fortifications for the year 1811.

With respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Honorable JOHN DAWSON, Chairman.

Estimate of moneys required on account of Fortifications, for the year 1811.

For completing fortifications in Georgia and South Carolina, including eleven thousand five hundred and seventy-one dollars and forty-two cents for the land on which Fort Mechanic, in the harbor of Charleston, is erected,	$55,000 00
Harbor of New York, (as per estimate enclosed)	83,303 86
Harbor of Newport, Rhode Island,	10,000 00
For general repairs of fortifications,	12,000 00
	160,303 86
Deduct balance unexpended of former appropriations,	29,257 56
	$131,046 30

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 8, 1811.

W. EUSTIS.

NEW YORK, December 29, 1810.

SIR:

I should have transmitted the enclosed estimates at an earlier day, if I could have obtained the requisite information from the several mechanics, it being my wish to come as near the real charges as the case would admit, and even now it should be considered that many requisites may occur at the finishing the work, which are not foreseen; for this reason I have omitted any allowance for the materials on hand. The several amounts are, viz:

For the work at West Head,	$51,531 71
For Castle William,	8,500 00
For Bedloe's Island,	18,965 14
	$78,996 85
Making, in the whole,	$78,996 85
To this should be added, in case the work at West Head is to be carried up two tiers,	$83,303 86

You will believe me when I assure you that, estimating future expenditures, (especially when this species of work is new and uncommon) is not only the most arduous, but the most unpleasant business belonging to an engineer.

In the present estimate I have endeavored to go into a minute detail, and have formed the aggregate from the best data I could obtain, and I hope the real expenditure will not exceed what is stated; but I beg your leave to solicit, for myself, those allowances which candor should make, in every case where the best means have been used to come at the real truth.

You will please to observe the difference between carrying the battery up to a second tier.

This is the difference between a perfect work of fifty-six guns, with ample accommodations for a garrison, and an imperfect work of twenty-eight guns, without any accommodation for the men when not on duty.

I have made no estimate for the battery on Ellis's Island, because I consider every thing there as temporary; to make a proper defence, these old works should be obliterated, and begun de novo.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant,

JONA. WILLIAMS.

Estimate of appropriation requisite to complete the works in the harbor of New York, exclusive of Ordnance.

WEST HEAD.

To complete this work as a battery, mounting twenty-eight guns, of the heaviest metal, in one tier, protected from small shot from ships' tops, by a roof, covered with slate, including materials and labor, but exclusive of carpenter's and smith's work, and also exclusive of materials on hand, - - - - - $39,340 79
Carpenter's and smith's work, - - - - - 12,190 92

$51,531 71

To complete the above battery, so as to mount twenty-eight guns, under bomb proof casements, with a terrace of masonry, and parapet, so as to mount a second tier of columbiads carrying shot of 50 lb. weight, including materials and labor, but exclusive of carpenter's and smith's work, and, also, exclusive of materials on hand, $124,582 31
Carpenter's and smith's work, - - - - - 10,253 26

$134,835 57

Deduct the estimate for one tier, which is included in this estimate, - - - - - 51,531 71

Difference, - - - - - $83,303 86

N. B. This difference is between a battery of one tier, with a wooden roof, without barracks, and unprotected from shells, and a battery of two tiers, with ample barracks for all the men requisite to defend it, and with a bomb proof protection for one of the tiers. The magazine, furnace, and officers' barracks, are nearly the same in both cases; but the roof, and piers to support it, will be a total loss, in case the battery should be first completed as for one, and, afterwards, be raised for two tier.

CASTLE WILLIAM.

To complete this castle, as originally planned, but without officers' quarters, mason work, and materials for exterior and interior gateway, magazine, wall around it, the interior wall, furnaces, and a small remnant of flagging on the top, - - - - - $7,500

Carpenter's and smith's work, to complete the men's barracks, and the interior of the magazine; also for putting up the iron railing round the interior edge of the terrace, making due allowance for the workmanship of army artificers, - - - - - 1,000

$8,500

BEDLOE'S ISLAND.

To complete the fort, exclusive of any further building for barracks, and including the guard house, mason work, and materials for magazine and gateway, and completing those parts of the counter scarp which had been left open for the passage of materials, and for carts employed in excavating the ditch, and raising the wall on the Southern side of the island, which has been found too low to support the requisite slope of the glacis, - - - - - $8,211 88

Carpenter's and smith's work, for completing the platform on every side, making the drawbridge, and building the guard house, - - - - - 10,753 26

$18,965 14

N. B. There remains much labor to be performed, to clear out the ditch and form the glacis, which is not included in the above estimate, supposing it to be done by army fatigues.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 20, 1811.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a return of the Militia of the United States, as received by the Department of War, from the several States and Territories.

EXPENSES OF ARMORIES, AND ARMS MANUFACTURED IN 1810.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 2, 1811.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 23, 1811.

SIR:

In obedience to the fifth section of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes," I have the honor of transmitting to Congress an account of the expenses of the national armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, together with a return of the arms made and repaired at each, during the year 1810.

It will appear from the report, that the amount of the expenditures at the armory at Harper's Ferry, for the last six months of the year 1810, are founded on estimates—the accounts for that period not having been received.

It may be proper also to state, that the account of the expenses at Harper's Ferry includes disbursements to a considerable amount, made at that place in 1810, for the erection of additional buildings.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Statement of the expenses of the National Armories at Springfield, Massachusetts, and at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, for one year, commencing the 1st of January, 1810, viz:

CANNON, SMALL ARMS, AND OTHER MUNITIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 16, 1811.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the committee to whom was referred "so much of the President's message as relates to the manufacture of cannon and small arms, and the providing munitions of war," *after having, according to order, considered the several subjects submitted, made the following report, in part:

That it is, at all times, expedient for a nation to be supplied with an ample stock of all such articles and materials as are requisite for defensive or offensive operations. Such provisions will make its citizens confident at home, whilst they, at the same time, guarantee respect on the part of foreign nations. No one, it is presumed, will deny that an extensive supply of the implements of war is preferable to the amount of their cost lying buried in the vaults of the treasury, more especially when it is considered that, on occasions of the first importance, they are indispensably necessary, and that for the greater part they are imperishable from their nature. The proposition just laid down will appear evident, when it is recollected that the least rumor of a war will immediately add to the value of such articles, very generally, from 50 to 100 per centum; nay, this declaration might have been carried much further; and it may not be out of place to notice the fact, that, under circumstances far from being the most unfavorable, refined saltpetre has commanded the enormous price of one dollar and fifty cents per pound; whereas, its ordinary value is about thirty cents per pound in our markets.

It is also well known, that all manufactured articles, which are made in haste, are generally very defective; this should be particularly guarded against in the case of fire arms of every description. When it becomes absolutely necessary to provide such equipments, contractors always insist upon their own terms. Experience has proved that contracts under such circumstances, on national account, (we do not confine this assertion to our own country) have been made to a great disadvantage. Regular annual supplies, in times of peace, should always be preferred. It would be unwarrantable in the extreme to hazard a want of this kind until the last moment—until the enemy may be at our doors. It will be in vain to look for additions from Europe at a period when the extensive naval force of an enemy, aided by many private armed ships, shall swarm on the ocean. Who could then be so hardy as to entertain the expectation of frequent arrivals in our parts?

It is with peculiar satisfaction your committee finds itself enabled, under the warranty of the proper departments, to state, that many of the most necessary, are articles of which there is a considerable stock on hand, and that others of them are abundant in our territories. Or, in the words of the message, we may be permitted to repeat that "the manufacture of cannon and small arms, and the stock and resources of all the necessary munitions are adequate to emergencies."

The flourishing state of the foundries throughout the United States; they have been heretofore successfully employed, on Government account, in Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, the District of Columbia, &c. The regular supplies of small arms of every description, from the establishments which are now under the control of the Government, and these seconded by the several contracts which have been already made with individuals in various parts of the Union, together with the ease with which they may be multiplied so as to meet any demands which circumstances may require, independent of the arrangements made on the part of the States, individually, are some of the many proofs which demonstrate the great resources of this republic. What nation can boast of more or better iron than the United States? Our foundries have not only been in successful operation; they are far from being infantile, and have arrived at perfection. Upon the best authority, we state the furnaces, forges, and bloomeries, in the United States, to be five hundred and thirty. The art of boring cannon is, in many places in Europe, deemed a secret of great importance; they there keep their cutters concealed from strangers in leathern bags. In the United States this process is so well understood, that an inspector of our artillery has declared to the world "he never was compelled to reject a gun on account of a defect in the bore," though he examined "upwards of two thousand cannon of different calibers."

It is notorious that we may have lead, from the mines in our country, to any amount. Our resources for saltpetre in the Western States are said to be inexhaustible. Of sulphur we have a considerable stock in store. Each of the States can furnish an extensive catalogue of powder mills; their number in the United States amounts to two hundred and seven, and many of them are celebrated for the excellence of their powder. Notwithstanding these facts, it is necessary to repeat, that, under the present aspect of affairs, it is proper a further provision of all the munitions of war be forthwith made. Expenditures to a considerable amount, when applied to such purposes, will ultimately be found to be economy in the true sense and meaning of the term, by the saving of the difference between the present prices and such as will be demanded when we shall be at war. In conformity with these views, your committee beg leave to report a bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 9th, 1811.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 28th November, requesting "a statement of the cannon and small arms, and of the munitions of war, generally, now on hand; and whether any, and, if any, to what extent, further purchases should be made, under the present aspect of affairs, and the amount of the appropriation necessary," I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a summary, marked A, of the most important articles in the Ordnance Department, now on hand, as taken from the returns of the superintendant of military stores, dated 1st November, 1811.

The manufacture of cannon and shot is progressing at the established foundries in the United States, increasing the supply on hand and admitting of any extension which circumstances may require.

A reference to the explanatory note on the summary marked A, will show that great deductions must be made from the number of stands of arms reported "fit for service." The number in store, fit for immediate use, may, however, be safely relied on as competent to supply any number of troops that will be brought into the field.

The public armories at Springfield, Massachusetts, and at Harper's Ferry, Virginia, furnish annually 20,000 stands. Those delivered on private contract amounted, in the year ending the 30th September, 1811, to 11,301.

From these sources, which may be extended as circumstances may require, a supply of arms of increasing superiority in fabric, competent to meet the emergencies of a war, however protracted, may with certainty be relied on.

The estimate for ordnance and ordnance stores, marked B, shows the quantity of such articles in that department as are, "under the present aspect of affairs," deemed expedient to be procured, in addition to those now on hand.

The estimate for camp equipage, and other quartermaster's stores, marked C, embraces a competent supply for 50,000 men for one year.

From these estimates, it will appear that the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars will be required to make the purchases.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Hon. ADAM SEYBERT, Chairman.

NOTE.—The cannon are generally good, sufficiently proved, and may be relied on. From the number of small arms reported “fit for service” it is presumed that a deduction of one-third should be made for those which may be found to want repairs, and for British, German, and other arms, of calibers different from the standard of the United States.

From the quantity of nitre returned, a deduction must be made of 242,175 pounds, loaned the Navy Department, and of 71,740 pounds due from the estate of Wheelen and Miller. From the quantity of sulphur returned, a deduction of 39,813 pounds, loaned the Navy Department.

FORTIFICATIONS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 17, 1811.

Mr. CHEVES, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message, of the 5th of November, 1811,* as relates to the defence of our maritime frontier, made the following report, in part:

That two communications, from the Secretary of War, which accompany this report, which were made in reply to queries propounded by the committee, contain the best information on this subject which they have been able to collect. That one of them contains an enumeration of the several permanent fortifications, which have been completed or commenced, with remarks on the troops necessary to garrison them. That, for the completion of works already commenced, no further appropriation is requisite. But that some additional works are deemed necessary, the precise extent of which cannot at present be determined: for which, and for contingent objects of defence on our maritime frontier, in the event of hostilities, the committee recommend an appropriation of one million of dollars; and the committee, for that purpose, beg leave to report a bill, entitled "A bill making a further appropriation for the defence of our maritime frontier."

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 3, 1811.

SIR: In answer to the following inquiries of the honorable committee, "to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the defence of our maritime frontier," viz:

"Is any, and, if any, what, additional appropriation necessary to complete the fortifications which have been already directed and commenced?"

"Are any, and, if any, what, additional fortifications necessary for the effectual defence of the maritime frontier of the United States?"

"Are any, and, if any, what, other means of defence necessary for the effectual protection of that frontier?"

"If any additional fortifications, or other means of defence, be necessary, what appropriation, distinguishing the sum required for each particular object, will be requisite?"

I have the honor to state, that the permanent works which have been directed and commenced, for the protection of our maritime frontier, are so far completed, on the plan originally laid down (with some additions) that the unexpended balance of the appropriation for that purpose is deemed sufficient to finish them.

"For the effectual defence of the maritime frontier of the United States," the fortifications which have been erected, in some ports, must be extended; in others, new and additional works will be necessary. The harbor of New York, from its exposed situation, and relative importance to the Union, together with the harbor of Newport, in Rhode Island, claim particular attention, and require additional means of defence.

As auxiliary to the fortifications, cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, have been deposited at the most convenient and important posts, which can be directed to such points as the movements and operations of an enemy may require. An additional number will be provided, but, as the expenditure incident to such additions comes within the ordnance department, the estimate will be submitted to the committee who have that subject under consideration.

As it is impossible to ascertain the extent of the additional fortifications which may become necessary in the event of war, no precise estimate can be offered of the expense of erecting them: it is, however, respectfully proposed, for the consideration of the honorable committee, that one million of dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

Honorable LANGDON CHEVES, Chairman.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 10, 1811.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 4th instant, requesting "what are the number, nature, and state of repair, of the fortifications of the maritime frontier of the United States, and what will be the number and character of the troops necessary for their defence," I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a general report, exhibiting the nature, extent, and condition, of the fortifications which have been constructed for the defence of the maritime frontier of the United States, together with the full complement of artillerymen, necessary to man the number of guns therein specified.

Part of the cannon, mounted on travelling carriages, not being included in the accompanying report, no estimate is offered of the number of artillerymen necessary to man them.

The first intention, of annexing to this report the number of infantry which may be required for the defence of each work, is found to be impracticable.

* See Foreign Relations, No. 32, page 79.

The description of an enemy's force, and the nature of his attack, may be such, that no corps of the army, except artillerists, will be requisite; they may be such as to require a body of infantry equal to the artillerists; and they may be such, that the number of infantry and other troops, necessary to cover the artillery and defend the works, must exceed, by a great proportion, that of the artillerists.

In this statement, the honorable committee will perceive the reasons which render it impossible to give a more precise and definite reply to this branch of their inquiry.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM EUSTIS.

The Honorable LANODON CHEVES, Chairman.

[1st SESSION.]

PROVISION FOR THE OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS WOUNDED, AND THE FAMILIES OF THOSE KILLED, IN THE ENGAGEMENT WITH THE INDIANS ON THE WABASH, IN 1811.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 8, 1812.

Mr. M'KEE, from the committee to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, transmitting two letters from Governor Harrison, of the Indiana territory, reporting the particulars* and the issue of the expedition under his command, against the hostile Indians on the Wabash; and to whom also was referred the memorial of the General Assembly of the Indiana territory, and the memorial of the officers and soldiers of the militia of Knox county, in the Indiana territory, who served in the late campaign under the command of Governor Harrison, made the following report:

That they have had the several matters to them referred under their consideration, and have given to them that attention which their importance seems to merit.

It appears to the committee that the troops under the command of Governor Harrison may very properly be termed raw troops; very few of the officers, and almost none of the men, had ever been in actual service, and a considerable proportion of them had been only a few weeks withdrawn from the pursuits of civil life. The attack made on this quickly assembled army, by the hostile Indians on the Wabash, when viewed, either as it relates to the nature of the enemy, the time, or the violence with which the attack was made, cannot but be considered of such a character as would have severely tested the collected firmness of the most able and experienced troops. This attack, violent and unexpected as it seems to have been, was repelled by the troops under the command of Governor Harrison, with a gallantry and good conduct worthy of future imitation. The whole transaction, in the opinion of the committee, presents to the American people a new proof that the dauntless spirit of our ancestors, by whom the war of the Revolution was so ably and successfully maintained, has not been diminished by more than thirty years of almost uninterrupted peace, but that it has been handed down unimpaired to their posterity.

In estimating the claims of the army on the Government of the United States, it is worthy of remark, that the nature of the country, as well as of the enemy to be encountered, subjected the army to many extreme hardships and equal dangers, where every thing was hazarded, and but little could be gained except the regard of their country.

The volunteers and militia (to whose claims the memorials referred to the committee particularly relate) were in actual service but a short time, for which alone they are entitled to pay by law; the compensation, therefore, to which they are entitled, is not at all commensurate to the services rendered and the dangers incurred; besides, many of the officers and men who fell, or were wounded, in the battle of the 7th of November, 1811, were purchasers of the public lands, for which they were indebted to the United States, which debt falls due in a short time, and the penalty of forfeiture will be incurred, if the debt is not paid. It would be unjust to inflict a penalty so severe on the disconsolate widows and orphans of those officers and soldiers of the volunteers and militia, who, in common with their brother officers and soldiers of the regular troops, fell in their country's cause in a manner so distinguished that nothing was wanting but a great occasion, interesting to the feelings of the American people, to have crowned their names with unfading laurels.

As an evidence, therefore, of the regard due to the bravery and ability displayed by the troops under the command of Governor Harrison, in the battle of the 7th of November, 1811, as well as to relieve the representatives of those who were killed in the action, from the pecuniary losses incurred in consequence thereof, the committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

1st. Resolved, That one month's pay ought to be allowed, in addition to the common allowance, to the officers, (according to the rank which they held) the non-commissioned officers and privates of the regulars, volunteers, and militia, and to the legal representatives of those who were killed, or have since died of their wounds, composing the army under the command of Governor Harrison, in the late campaign on the Wabash.

2d. Resolved, That five years' half-pay ought to be allowed to the legal representatives of the officers, (according to the rank which they held) the non-commissioned officers and privates of the volunteers and militia who were killed in the battle of the 7th of November, 1811, or who have since died of their wounds.

3d. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to place on the pension list the officers (according to the rank which they held) the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the volunteers and militia who served in the late campaign on the Wabash, under the command of Governor Harrison, and who have been wounded or disabled in the said campaign.

4th. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to pay for the horses and other property of individuals, lost in, or in consequence of, the said battle.

5th. Resolved, That the further time of _____ years ought to be allowed to the officers and soldiers who were wounded, and to the legal representatives of those who were killed, in the said battle, to complete the payments due, or which may fall due, to the United States, on any purchase of the public lands made by them before the said battle.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY FORCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 31, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 23, 1812.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 16th instant, requesting "an estimate of the appropriation necessary for the service of the year 1812, to carry into effect the act passed at the present session, entitled 'An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force,'" I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the estimates marked A, B, C, D, and E, as also a recapitulation of the whole, marked F, amounting to six millions six hundred and ninety-seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-two dollars and fifty-four cents. But, as a part of the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, appropriated by the act of the 14th of January, of the present year, for the purchase of ordnance, ordnance stores, camp equipage, and other quartermaster's stores, may be applied to the purchase of several items contained in the estimates, a deduction may be made—

On account of wagons,	-	-	-	-	-	$47,640
Do. camp equipage,	-	-	-	-	-	206,100
Do. tools and implements,	-	-	-	-	-	13,900

making in the whole, a deduction of two hundred and sixty-seven thousand six hundred and forty dollars, and leaving a balance of six millions four hundred and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty-four cents, to be appropriated for the service of the present year.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

ARMORIES, AND ARMS MANUFACTURED THEREIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 17th, 1812.

SIR: In conformity to the fifth section of the act of the 2d April, 1794, I have the honor to transmit to Congress, a statement of the amount of expenditures on account of the national armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, during the year 1811, and of the number of arms made and repaired at each place during the same period.

With the greatest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 6, 1812.

Resolved by the General Assembly for the State of Kentucky, That, whereas the subject of our national militia, at all times important, seems, from the aspect of our foreign relations, to be peculiarly so at the present time; and experience having shown that the present system has great defects, producing much inconvenience without many of those benefits which a better arrangement would ensure; and the Legislature of this State being impressed with a belief that an adequate remedy for the evil rests in the hands of the General Government alone, which has a constitutional power to provide for the organization, arming, and disciplining our national force; this Legislature, in behalf of their constituents, with every deference to the wisdom of those whose power and duty it is to act finally on the subject, will proceed to suggest their ideas on some of the inconveniences which attend the present militia system, together with the mode in which they might be obviated, with a view of their being submitted to the competent authority.

1. Although a well organized militia is the greatest safeguard of a free people, because the soldiers being the citizens, their military interest is to secure their civil rights; yet the safeguard can only be available, in proportion to the capacity of the militia to act with effect.

2. This capacity seems to be composed of numbers, organization, discipline, and arms; which latter may include camp equipage and the necessary munitions of war.

3. Number is but one ingredient of military capacity, because a small number, well armed and disciplined, will defeat a larger one, which is inferior in these two respects.

4. Organization seems to be the mean by which any given number of troops may be disposed of, so as to act; and the more perfect this is, with so much more facility can that number be brought into action to the extent of its force, upon any emergency.

5. The extent of the force of a given number of troops, when brought into action, will be, in the general, in proportion to its discipline and armature; these two, therefore, seem to compose the hand that is to execute; and the more perfect they are when in action, in that proportion will the force of any given number of men be greater; and, as it is seen that the perfection of this force, the reverse of that of a standing army, turns to the advantage of the State against her enemies, without threatening the rights of her citizens; the object, then, which highly interests every portion of the Union, seems evidently to be so to organize the national force, that it can be used with the greatest facility and effect, for legitimate purposes, while the soldier shall be still so far a citizen, as to have an interest in respecting the rights of the latter, which are, in fact, his own; so as never to cause an abuse or diversion of that force from its true end.

If, therefore, every individual in the United States, capable of bearing arms, were to be so organized, disciplined, armed, and accoutred, as to act when required, it would certainly present the spectacle of a perfect militia of the whole, which no age or country ever witnessed, and, most probably, in a country or government like ours, never will be seen. And, if a general draught were to be made—and we ought to calculate on the effect of this—to be equal, it must be impartial; and how many who would have neither arms, accoutrements, or discipline, would be thus designated?—men who might be useful at home, but who would scarcely find employment for our enemies, even if armed; and whose rout and slaughter would only serve to mark our calamity, and spread dismay amongst our friends; and experience has proved that substitutes are seldom worth any thing. But does not the circumstance of a general draught show forcibly the defect of our militia organization? How much time is lost in mustering all the militia in the United States? How much will it require to hunt up arms, and to get those of a proper description? The latter, we much suspect, could not be easily procured. Thus it has happened, as it is thence to be inferred, will again happen, that the season for action has passed away in preparation, giving, in many cases, advantages to the enemy, not easily regained.

6. But it is seen from experience that habits of discipline are most effectually acquired in youth. The youth, too, of every country, seem to be, from their vigor and alertness, best calculated for military service; their very ardor, itself, seems to be the guarantee of successful enterprise; and certainly they can be spared for this service, with much less inconvenience to the avocations of civil life, than the heads of families; and these pursuits must still be attended to, or the very sinews of war will be dried up or broken.

7. The remedy, therefore, which this Legislature would beg leave to submit for the consideration of Congress, is, to class the militia between certain ages, and, without intending the slightest disrespect to the wisdom of that honorable body, they would, by way of example, submit, that the militia might be divided into three classes: The first, to be composed of all capable of bearing arms, and not exempted by law, between fifteen and twenty-one years of age; the second, between twenty-one and twenty-seven years of age; the third between twenty-seven and forty-five years of age. The principal object of the first class would be to acquire a knowledge of tactics and discipline; of the second, which might be denominated the effective one, to be completely armed and equipped to march whenever required; of the third, to form a reserve, and which need not be compelled to attend musters, unless when they were called upon to render actual service.

It is not deemed proper to enter into a detail of measures for keeping the middle or effective class properly armed and equipped; that it should be so, is evident.

The progress of all capable of bearing arms, through the several classes, would promise a greater perfection in discipline, than can be effected under the present plan; all would, in fact, have thus passed through a school, in which it would have been taught, and, perhaps, more than a million of dollars be annually saved to the community in the labor of those excused from uselessly attending musters. But the greatest advantage which would result from it, would be the keeping an effective, disposable, and competent military force, at all times ready for service, without the danger and inconvenience resulting from a standing army. These ideas are submitted, merely with the view that the attention of the National Legislature should be called to the subject, and it appears that none can be of higher moment.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted, one to the President of the United States, and one to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, for the purpose of being submitted to that body.

JOHN SIMPSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MILITARY FORCE IN JUNE, 1812.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 9, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 6, 1812.

SIR: By the consent of the President, I have the honor herewith to enclose, in the same confidence in which the information was required, statements from the proper officers, which, it is presumed, will answer satisfactorily the inquiries contained in your letter of the fifth instant, relative to the present state of the army.

The regular troops reported at several of the most important maritime posts receive continual reinforcements from the recruits, and in calculating the force for this defence, the aid of the militia of the vicinity is relied on in cases of emergency. Sixteen hundred militia have marched for the defence of the northern frontier of the State of New York, and six companies of militia artillery have been detached for the works in the city and harbor of New York. Twelve hundred volunteers and militia have marched for Detroit; two companies have been ordered to Sandusky; and the six companies of rangers, authorized by law, to the frontiers of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Louisiana. The Governors of other States have been directed to furnish detachments of militia, on the requisitions of the Generals charged with the defence of the maritime frontier.

When the extent of country, the disadvantages under which the recruiting service was commenced, and the uncertainty which has prevailed in the public mind relative to the ulterior measures which would be adopted, are considered, the success which has attended this service will be found to have equalled any reasonable expectations.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

HON. JOSEPH ANDERSON, Chairman.INSPECTOR GENERAL'S OFFICE, June 5, 1812.

SIR:

You have been pleased to address to this office the following inquiries:

1. What is the amount of the force raised under the act, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force?"

2. Are the troops newly raised sufficiently equipped and disciplined to fit them for immediate service?

With relation to the first inquiry, I would state, that the recruiting instructions, which issued from this office on the 28th of March last, it was directed, that "the commanding officers of recruiting districts shall monthly make returns to the commanding officer of the department, who will make monthly returns to the Department of War."

No returns were made for the month of April, from any of the recruiting departments, except No. 5, including the States of New York and Connecticut; and the return from that department only exhibited the number of recruits in three of the six recruiting districts which it contains.

No return has yet been received from any of the recruiting departments for the month of May.

Some imperfect reports and estimates of the number of recruits, dated on various days in the month of May, have been received from nine of the forty-eight districts into which the United States and their territories were divided; but the information they contain is not sufficient whereon to found a probable conjecture of the whole amount of the force raised under the act aforesaid.

To your second inquiry I cannot directly reply, not having inspected the troops newly raised. Orders have issued for delivering arms to a part of them; and by communications, received at this office, it appears that seven thousand three hundred and ninety-seven suits of clothing, deficient in some articles, were issued at Philadelphia, and forwarded, during the months of April and May, for the recruits of the additional army.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient,

ALEXANDER SMYTH,
Acting Inspector General.

HON. WILLIAM EUSTIS.

Return of the number of Troops in service on the Peace Establishment, and Additional Military Force of 1808; number on the Southern and Western frontier, and where stationed; number at Detroit, and on the march to that place; number in the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina; number in the harbors of New York, Rhode Island, and Boston, and the number at Fort Mifflin; also, the number required for the defence of the harbor of New York.

Number of troops in service on the Peace Establishment, and Additional Military force of 1808, including recruits,	6,744
Point Petre, St. Mary's river, Georgia,	194
Fort Hawkins, Georgia,	73
Fort Stoddart, Mississippi territory,	469
Fort St. Philip,	72
New Orleans and Fort St. John,	143
Pass Christian and Baton Rouge,	1,244
Natchitoches,	89
Fort Hampton and Highwassee,	169
Fort Massac,	36
Belle Fontaine,	134
Fort Osage,	63
Fort Madison,	44
Vincennes, and vicinity,	117
Michillimackinack,	88
Fort Dearborn,	53
Fort Wayne,	85
Detroit,	119
On the march to Detroit,	430
Harbor of Charleston, South Carolina,	175
Harbor of New York,	901
Harbor of Newport, Rhode Island,	193
Boston harbor,	131
Fort Mifflin,	65

It is computed that three thousand men are sufficient to man the works in the city and harbor of New York, exclusive of the works at the Narrows, and of the cannon on travelling carriages; and that seven hundred and fifty men are sufficient for the works in the harbor of Newport, Rhode Island.

The returns of recruits for May, with one or two exceptions, have not been received. The increase may be estimated at one thousand men.

From the first of January to the 30th of April, 1812, have been enlisted eleven hundred and twenty-five recruits.

INSPECTOR'S OFFICE, June 6, 1812.

A. Y. NICOLL,
Adjutant and Inspector.

SENATE CHAMBER, June 8, 1812.

SIR:

The committee of the Senate, to whom was referred the confidential message of the President,* have directed me to ask of you an explanation of the detailed report received from your office, signed by Mr. Nicoll, Adjutant and Inspector.

The return states the whole number of troops in service on the Peace Establishment, and additional military force of 1808, to be 6,744; the specification amounting to 5,087. It is desirable to know where the different number of 1,657 are stationed, and whether the 1,125 recruits, referred to as having been enlisted to April 30th, and the recruits since April, supposed to amount to 1,000 men, are both, or either, included in the aggregate first mentioned of 6,744 men; and whether the 1,000 men, supposed to be enlisted in the month of May, are exclusively for the Peace Establishment and additional military force of 1808. It would also be desirable to know, as far as you are able to form an opinion, from any probable data you are in possession of, or informal information, the number of recruits which you may have reason to suppose are at this time enlisted for the additional military force of 25,000.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 8, 1812.

SIR:

On considering again your letter of this morning, which was answered in haste, I perceive a desire on the part of the honorable committee, that an opinion should be expressed of the number of recruits, raised under the late act providing an additional military force; and although there are no official data on which to ground a correct opinion of their numbers, I have no hesitancy in giving an inofficial opinion, that they may be safely estimated at five thousand.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Hon. JOSEPH ANDERSON.

WAR OFFICE, June 9, 1812.

SIR:

Letters received from Generals Dearborn and Bloomfield, by the mail of yesterday, confirm the opinion given of the number of recruits raised at this time. General Bloomfield, from the numbers which have already joined him, has considered it unnecessary to call into actual service the companies of militia artillery, which have been detached, and are in readiness to repair to the batteries in New York. General Dearborn reports the recruiting service as going on very well, and speaks of "completing" his corps much sooner than was expected.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

Hon. JOSEPH ANDERSON.

OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEER CORPS TO BE COMMISSIONED BY THE UNITED STATES, AND PROVIDING FOR ADDITIONAL GENERAL AND STAFF OFFICERS AND ENGINEERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 30, 1812.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

With a view the better to adapt to the public service the volunteer force contemplated by the act passed on the 6th day of February, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of making the requisite provision for the officers thereof being commissioned by the authority of the United States.

Considering the distribution of the military forces of the United States, required by the circumstances of our country, I recommend also to the consideration of Congress the expediency of providing for the appointment of an additional number of general officers, and of deputies in the Adjutant's, Quartermaster's, Inspectors, and Paymaster's departments of the army, and for the employment, in cases of emergency, of additional Engineers.

DEFENCE OF NEW CASTLE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, ON THE 30TH OF JUNE, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 29th, 1812.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of 26th instant, on the memorial of the citizens of New Castle, in the State of Delaware, has the honor respectfully to report:

That an extensive arsenal of brick has been erected at New Castle, in which four heavy cannon have been deposited, mounted on field carriages, and furnished with the necessary implements, calculated for such temporary batteries, or other defence, as the exigency of the moment might require. Orders have been given for supplying them with fixed ammunition, and preparing them in other respects for immediate service.

In the general arrangements for the defence of the sea coast, the town of New Castle will continue to receive the attention of the President.

REFUSAL OF THE GOVERNORS OF MASSACHUSETTS AND CONNECTICUT TO FURNISH THEIR QUOTAS OF MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, NOVEMBER 6, 1812.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of the correspondence between the Department of War and the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, referred to in my message* of the fourth instant.

JAMES MADISON.

November 6, 1812.

[CIRCULAR.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1812.

SIR:

I am instructed by the President of the United States to call upon the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, their respective proportions of one hundred thousand militia, officers included, by virtue of an act of Congress, passed the 10th instant, entitled "An act to authorize a detachment from the militia of the United States."

This, therefore, is to require your Excellency to take effectual measures for having ten thousand of the militia of Massachusetts (being her quota) detached, and duly organized in companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, within the shortest period that circumstances will permit, and, as nearly as possible, in the following proportions of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, viz: One-twentieth part of artillery, one-twentieth part of cavalry, and the residue infantry. There will, however, be no objection, on the part of the President of the United States, to the admission of a proportion of riflemen, duly organized in distinct corps, and not exceeding one-tenth part of the whole quota of the States, respectively. Each corps should be properly armed and equipped for actual service.

When the detachment and organization shall have been effected, the respective corps will be exercised under the officers set over them, but will not remain embodied, or be considered as in actual service, until, by subsequent orders, they shall be directed to take the field.

* See Foreign Relations, No. 33.

Your Excellency will please to direct that correct muster rolls and inspection returns be made of the several corps, and that copies thereof be transmitted to this Department, as early as possible.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency the GOVERNOR of Massachusetts.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 12, 1812.

SIR:

I am directed by the President to request your Excellency to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Massachusetts, detached conformably to the act of April 10th, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the sea coast.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency CALEB STRONG, Governor of Massachusetts.

HEAD QUARTERS, BOSTON, June 22d, 1812.

SIR:

I have received instructions from the President of the United States to call on your Excellency for such part of the quota of militia from the State of Massachusetts, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10th, 1812, as I may deem necessary for the defence of the sea coast; and I now have the honor of requesting your Excellency to order fourteen companies of artillery, and twenty-seven companies of infantry, into the service of the United States, for the defence of the ports and harbors in this State, and the harbor of Newport.

The companies are intended for the following ports and harbors, viz: Passamaquoddy, one company of artillery, and four companies of infantry, with a full complement of officers, to be commanded by a major; Marblehead, Salem, Cape Ann, and Newburyport, two companies of artillery and two companies of infantry; Boston, four companies of artillery and eight companies of infantry, with one lieutenant colonel commandant and one major; and eight companies of infantry for the defence of Rhode Island.

Having received official information that war has been declared by Congress against Great Britain, your Excellency will perceive the expediency of giving facility to such measures as the crisis demands; and, as the defence of the sea coast of New England is, at present, confided to my direction, I shall, with confidence, rely on all the aid and support that the respective Governors can afford, and more especially on that of the Governor of the important State of Massachusetts; and I shall, at all times, receive, with the greatest pleasure, any advice or information that your Excellency may be pleased to communicate.

With respectful consideration, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

His Excellency CALEB STRONG, Governor of Massachusetts.

Omitted in the above.—Machias, one company of artillery; Penobscot, one company of artillery and two companies of infantry, to be commanded by a major; Wiscasset and Damariscotta, two companies of artillery, one each; Kennebunk, one company of artillery; Portland, two companies of artillery and three companies of infantry, to be commanded by a major.

BOSTON, June 26, 1812.

SIR:

Not having received any notice from your Excellency, or the Adjutant General, of what measures have been taken for calling into the service of the United States, for the defence of our sea coast, the companies of detached militia, proposed in a note I had the honor of addressing to your Excellency, on the 22d instant, a sense of duty compels me to solicit such information on the subject, as the urgency of the case demands; and I am persuaded that no unnecessary delay will disappoint my anxious desire for as early information as circumstances will admit.

With great respect, &c.

H. DEARBORN.

His Excellency CALEB STRONG, &c.

BOSTON, June 26, 1812.

SIR:

I have received your letter, of this day, in which you request information of the measures which have been taken for calling the militia into the service of the United States.

I find that Governor Gerry, on the 25th of April last, ordered that ten thousand men should be detached from the militia of this State; but, I am informed by the adjutant general, that the returns of those detachments have not come to hand, except in a very few instances.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

To Major General DEARBORN.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21st, 1812.

SIR:

By information received from Major General Dearborn, it appears that the detachments from the militia of Massachusetts, for the defence of the maritime frontier, required by him under the authority of the President, by virtue of the act of the 10th of April, 1812, have not been marched to the several stations assigned them.

Inasmuch as longer delay may be followed with distress to a certain portion of our fellow-citizens, and with injurious consequences to our country, I am commanded, by the President, to inform your Excellency, that this arrangement of the militia was preparatory to the march of the regular troops to the Northern frontier. The exigencies of the service have required, and orders have accordingly been given to Major General Dearborn, to move the regular troops to that frontier, leaving a sufficient number to man the guns in the garrisons on the seaboard. The execution of this order increases, as your Excellency cannot fail to observe, the necessity of hastening the detached militia to their several posts, as assigned by General Dearborn, in which case, they will, of course, be considered in the actual service and pay of the United States.

The danger of invasion, which existed at the time of issuing the order of the President, increases, and I am specially directed by the President, to urge the consideration to your Excellency, as requiring the necessary order to be given for the immediate march of the several detachments specified by General Dearborn, to their respective posts.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency CALEB STRONG, Governor of Massachusetts.

Boston, August 5, 1812.

SIR:

I received your letter of the 21st July, when at Northampton, and the next day came to Boston. The people of this State appear to be under no apprehension of an invasion; several towns, indeed, on the sea coast, soon after the declaration of war, applied to the Governor and Council for arms and ammunition, similar to the articles of that kind which had been delivered to them by the State, in the course of the last war; and, in some instances, they were supplied accordingly. But they expressed no desire that any part of the militia should be called out for their defence, and, in some cases, we were assured such a measure would be disagreeable to them.

You observe, in your last letter, that the danger of invasion which existed at the time of issuing the order of the President, increases. It would be difficult to infer, from this expression, that, in your opinion, that danger is now very considerable, as the President's order must have been issued before war was declared, your former letter being dated the 12th of June, and General Dearborn's, who was then at Boston, on the 22d of that month; besides, it can hardly be supposed that, if this State had been in great danger of invasion, the troops would have been called from hence to carry on offensive operations in a distant Province. However, as it was understood that the Governor of Nova Scotia had, by proclamation, forbid any incursions or depredations upon our territories, and as an opinion generally prevailed that the Governor had no authority to call the militia into actual service, unless one of the exigencies contemplated by the constitution exists, I thought it expedient to call the Council together, and, having laid before them your letter, and those I had received from General Dearborn, I requested their advice on the subject of them.

The Council advised, "that they are unable, from a view of the constitution of the United States, and the letters aforesaid, to perceive that any exigency exists, which can render it advisable to comply with the said requisition. But as, upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions, the Governor and Council have authority to require the opinion of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, it is advisable to request the opinion of the Supreme Court, upon the following questions:

1st. Whether the commanders in chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies contemplated by the constitution of the United States exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him, pursuant to acts of Congress?

2d. Whether, when either of the exigencies exist, authorizing the employing of the militia in the service of the United States, the militia thus employed can be lawfully commanded by any officer but of the militia, except by the President of the United States?"

I enclose a copy of the answers given by the judges to these questions. Since the Council were called, a person deputed by the towns of Eastport and Robinston, on our Eastern boundary, at Passamaquoddy, applied to me, representing that they had no apprehensions of invasion by an authorized British force, but that there were many lawless people on the borders from whom they were in danger of predatory incursions, and requesting that they might be furnished with some arms and ammunition, and that three companies of militia might be called out for their protection. The Council advised that they should be supplied with such arms and ammunition as were necessary for their present defence, which has been ordered. They also advised me to call into the service of the United States three companies of the detached militia, for the purposes above mentioned. I have this day issued an order for calling out three companies of the detached militia, to be marched, forthwith, to Passamaquoddy, and to be commanded by a major. Two of the companies will be stationed at Eastport, and one company at Robinston, until the President shall otherwise direct.

I have no intention officiously to interfere in the measures of the General Government, but if the President was fully acquainted with the situation of this State, I think he would have no wish to call our militia into service in the manner proposed by General Dearborn.

It is well known that the enemy will find it difficult to spare troops sufficient for the defence of their own territory, and predatory incursions are not likely to take place in this State: for, at every point, except Passamaquoddy, which can present no object to those incursions, the people are too numerous to be attacked by such parties as generally engage in expeditions of that kind.

General Dearborn proposed that the detached militia should be stationed at only a few of the ports and places on the coast; from the rest, a part of their militia were to be called away. This circumstance would increase their danger; it would invite the aggressions of the enemy, and diminish their power of resistance.

The whole coast of Cape Cod is exposed, as much as any part of the State, to depredations; part of the militia must, according to this detaching order, be marched from their homes; and yet, no place in the old colony of Plymouth is assigned to be the rendezvous of any of the detached militia.

Every harbor or port within the State has a compact settlement, and, generally, the country around the harbors is populous. The places contemplated in General Dearborn's specification, as the rendezvous of the detached militia, excepting in one or two instances, contain more of the militia than the portion of the detached militia assigned to them. The militia are well organized, and would undoubtedly prefer to defend their firesides, in company with their friends, under their own officers, rather than to be marched to some distant place, while strangers might be introduced to take their places at home.

In Boston, the militia are well disciplined, and could be mustered in an hour upon any signal of an approaching enemy, and in six hours the neighboring towns would pour in a greater force than any invading enemy will bring against it.

The same remark applies to Salem, Marblehead, and Newburyport, places whose harbors render an invasion next to impossible. In all of them, there are, in addition to the common militia, independent corps of infantry and artillery, well disciplined and equipped, and ready, both in disposition and means, to repair to any place where invasion may be threatened, and able to repel it, except it should be made by a fleet of heavy ships, against which nothing perhaps but strong fortifications, garrisoned by regular troops, would prove any defence, until the enemy should land, when the entire militia would be prepared to meet them.

Kennebunk is unassailable by any thing but boats, which the numerous armed population is competent to resist. Portland has a militia, and independent corps, sufficiently numerous for its defence; and the same is the case with Wiscasset and Castine.

Against predatory incursions, the militia of each place would be able to defend their property, and, in a very short time, they would be aided, if necessary, by the militia of the surrounding country. In case of a more serious invasion, whole brigades or divisions could be collected, seasonably, for defence. Indeed, considering the state of the militia in this Commonwealth, I think there can be no doubt that, detaching a part of it, and distributing it into small portions, will tend to impair the defensive power.

I have thus freely expressed to you my own sentiments, and, so far as I have heard, they are the sentiments of the best informed men. I am fully disposed to afford all the aid to the measures of the National Government which the constitution requires of me; but I presume it will not be expected, or desired, that I shall fail in the duty which I owe to the people of this State, who have confided their interests to my care.

I am, sir, with respect, your most obedient and humble servant,

CALEB STRONG.

Hon. W. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

To his Excellency the Governor and the Honorable the Council of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The undersigned, Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, have considered the questions proposed by your Excellency and Honors for their opinion:

By the constitution of this State, the authority of commanding the militia of the Commonwealth is vested exclusively in the Governor, who has all the powers incident to the office of Commander-in-chief, and is to exercise them personally, or by subordinate officers under his command, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the constitution and the laws of the land.

While the Governor of the Commonwealth remained in the exercise of these powers, the Federal constitution was ratified, by which was vested in the Congress a power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to provide for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers.

The Federal constitution further provides that the President shall be Commander-in-chief of the army of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

On the construction of the Federal and State constitutions must depend the answers to the several questions proposed. As the militia of the several States may be employed in the service of the United States, for the three specific purposes of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and of repelling invasions, the opinion of the Judges is requested whether the Commanders-in-Chief of the militia of the several States have a right to determine whether any of the exigencies aforesaid exist, so as to require them to place the militia, or any part of it, in the service of the United States, at the request of the President, to be commanded by him pursuant to acts of Congress.

It is the opinion of the undersigned that this right is vested in the Commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States.

The Federal constitution provides that, whenever either of these exigencies exist, the militia may be employed, pursuant to some act of Congress, in the service of the United States; but no power is given either to the President, or to the Congress, to determine that either of the said exigencies do in fact exist. As this power is not delegated to the United States, by the Federal constitution, nor prohibited by it, to the States, it is reserved to the States, respectively; and, from the nature of the power, it must be exercised by those with whom the States have, respectively, entrusted the chief command of the militia.

It is the duty of these commanders to execute this important trust agreeably to the laws of their several States, respectively, without reference to the laws, or officers, of the United States, in all cases except those specially provided in the Federal constitution. They must, therefore, determine when either of the special cases exist, obliging them to relinquish the execution of this trust, and to render themselves, and the militia, subject to the command of the President. A different construction, giving to Congress the right to determine when these special cases exist, authorizing them to call forth the whole of the militia, and taking them from the Commanders-in-chief of the several States, and subjecting them to the command of the President, would place all the militia, in effect, at the will of Congress, and produce a military consolidation of the States, without any constitutional remedy, against the intentions of the people when ratifying the constitution. Indeed, since passing the act of Congress, of February 28th, 1795, c. 101, vesting in the President the power of calling forth the militia, when the exigencies mentioned in the constitution shall exist, if the President has the power of determining when those exigencies exist, the militia of the several States is in effect at his command and subject to his control.

No inconveniences can reasonably be presumed to result from the construction, which vests in the Commanders-in-chief of the militia of the several States, the right of determining when the exigencies exist, obliging them to place the militia in the service of the United States. These exigencies are of such a nature, that the existence of them can be easily ascertained by, or made known to, the Commander-in-chief of the militia, and when ascertained, the public interest will produce prompt obedience to the acts of Congress.

Another question proposed to the consideration of the Judges, is, Whether, when either of the exigencies exist authorizing the employing of the militia in the service of the United States, the militia thus employed can be lawfully commanded by any officer but of the militia, except by the President of the United States?

The Federal constitution declares that the President shall be Commander-in-chief of the army of the United States. He may undoubtedly exercise this command by officers of the army of the United States, by him commissioned according to law. The President is also declared to be the Commander-in-chief of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. The officers of the militia are to be appointed by the States, and the President may exercise his command of the militia by officers of the militia duly appointed.

But we know of no constitutional provision authorizing any officer of the army of the United States to command the militia, or authorizing any officer of the militia to command the army of the United States. The Congress may provide laws for the government of the militia, when in actual service, but to extend this power to the placing them under the command of an officer not of the militia, except the President, would render nugatory the provision, that the militia are to have officers appointed by the States.

The union of the militia in the actual service of the United States with troops of the United States, so far as to form one army, seems to be a case not provided for, or contemplated, in the constitution. It is, therefore, not within our department to determine on whom the command would devolve, on such an emergency, in the absence of the President; whether one officer, either of the militia, or of the army of the United States, to be settled according to military rank, should command the whole; whether the corps must be commanded by their respective officers, acting in concert as allied forces; or what other expedient should be adopted, are questions to be answered by others.

The undersigned regret that the distance of the other Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court renders it impracticable to obtain their opinions, seasonably, upon the questions submitted.

THEOPHILUS PARSONS,
SAMUEL SEWALL,
ISAAC PARKER.

BOSTON, August 21, 1812.

SIR:

I mentioned in my letter to you of the 5th of August, that I had that day issued an order for calling out three companies of the detached militia, to be marched immediately to Passamaquoddy, for the defence of that frontier, and to be commanded by a major. In my instructions to Major General Sewall, to be communicated to the major to be designated by him, I directed that two of the companies should be stationed at Eastport, and one company at Robinston, until the President should direct otherwise, unless, in the mean time, the major, with the advice of Brigadier General Brewer, who lives at Robinston, and to whom I wrote on the subject, should think a different disposition of the companies would be more advantageous.

I have this day received a letter from General Sewall, dated the 17th instant, in which he says that he had designated the detached company in the neighborhood of Eastport, under the command of Captain Thomas Vose, Junior, of Robinston. The detached company in the interior neighborhood of Penobscot river, under the command of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, of Orrington, and the detached company in the same neighborhood, under the command of Captain Thomas George, of Brewer, to form a battalion, to be commanded by Major Nathan Low, of Deer Isle, and directed them to march immediately to Eastport, and that they would probably march the next day. I shall immediately write to Major Low, and direct him to conform to the above instructions, in disposing of the companies, until the President of the United States shall otherwise direct.

I am, sir, with respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

NORTHAMPTON, September 10, 1812.

SIR:

I received this morning a letter from Major General Sewall, dated the first of this month, in which he mentioned that the detached troops, from the neighborhood of Penobscot, had marched to Eastport, five or six days before that time, with their adjutant and quartermaster, but that Major Low, who was appointed to command them, had been released from that service, on account of bodily infirmity, and that Major Jacob Ulmer, of Lincolnville, was appointed in his room, and had been notified to proceed immediately to Eastport.

General Sewall observes that application had been made to him for the appointment of a commissary and surgeon, for the post at Eastport, and if those appointments, or either of them, are thought necessary, he proposes Mr. Chevy, an officer of the artillery, for the former, and Doctor Bastow, a surgeon in the militia, for the latter, both inhabitants of Eastport.

I am, sir, with sentiments of respect, your most obedient servant,

CALEB STRONG.

Honorable WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

LYME, 20th April, 1812.

SIR:

I had the honor this morning to receive your letter of the 15th instant, containing the directions of the President of the United States for detaching three thousand of the militia of this State, agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress of the 10th instant. The act itself has not been received, and it will be very satisfactory to me to receive a copy of it, by the next mail, from your Department. In the mean time, every preparation will be made for detaching the officers and men, agreeably to the directions already received.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROGER GRISWOLD.

Honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 12, 1812.

SIR:

I am directed by the President to request your Excellency to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Connecticut, detached conformably to the act of April 10th, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the sea coast.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Excellency ROGER GRISWOLD, Governor of Connecticut.

LYME, 17th June, 1812.

SIR:

I have had the honor this afternoon to receive your letter of the 12th instant, communicating to me the request of the President that I would order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major General Dearborn, such part of the quota of militia from the State of Connecticut, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10th, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the sea coast.

In obedience to which request, I shall, on the requisition of General Dearborn, execute, without delay, the request of the President.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ROGER GRISWOLD.

Honorable Wm. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

SHARON, CONNECTICUT, July 2, 1812.

SIR:

His Excellency Governor Griswold has received from Major General Henry Dearborn a letter, under date of the 23d of last month, requesting that five companies of the militia of this State, detached conformably to the act of Congress of April 10, 1812, may be ordered into the service of the United States, to wit: "Two companies of artillery, and two companies of infantry, to be placed under the command of the commanding officer at Fort Trumbull, near New London, and one company of artillery, to be stationed at the battery at the entrance of the harbor of New Haven."

Impressed with the deep importance of the requisition, and the serious consideration it involves, his Excellency deemed it expedient to convene the Council at Hartford, on Monday the 29th ultimo. He has taken their advice upon this interesting subject, and has formed his own deliberate opinion; but, as he is under the necessity of leaving the State, on a journey for the recovery of his health, it becomes my duty, as Lieutenant Governor, to communicate to you the result.

The assurance contained in the Governor's letter of the 17th of June last, in answer to your's of the 12th of the same month, was necessarily given in full confidence that no demand would be made through General Dearborn, but in strict conformity to the constitution and laws of the United States. His Excellency regrets to perceive that the present requisition is supported by neither.

The constitution of the United States has ordained that Congress may provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Accordingly, the acts of Congress of February, 1795, and of April, 1812, do provide for calling forth the militia in the exigencies above mentioned. The Governor is not informed of any declaration made by the President of the United States, or of notice by him given, that the militia are required "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, or repel invasions." As, therefore, none of the contingencies enumerated in the constitution, and recognised by the laws, are shown to have taken place, his Excellency considers that, under existing circumstances, no portion of the militia of this State can be withdrawn from his authority. Farther, if the call had been justified by either of the constitutional exigencies already recited, still, in the view of his Excellency, an insuperable objection presents itself against placing the men under the immediate command of an officer or officers of the army of the United States.

The appointment of the officers of the militia is by the constitution expressly reserved "to the States respectively." In the event of their being called into the actual service of the United States, in the cases above specified, the laws of the United States provide for their being called forth as militia, furnished with proper officers by the State. And, sir, it will not escape your notice, that the detachment from the militia of this State, under the act of Congress of the 10th of April last, is regularly organized into a division, consisting of brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, and supplied according to law with all the necessary officers. His Excellency conceives, then, that an order to detach a number of companies sufficient for the command of a battalion officer, and place them under the command of an officer of the United States, cannot, with propriety, be executed, unless he were also prepared to admit that the privates may be separated from their company officers, and transferred into the army of the United States; thus leaving the officers of the militia without any command, except in name; and in effect impairing, if not annihilating, the militia itself, so sacredly guaranteed by the constitution to the several States. Under these impressions, the Governor has thought proper, by and with the advice of the Council, to refuse a compliance with the requisition of Major General Dearborn.

His Excellency is sincerely disposed to comply promptly with all the constitutional requests of the National Executive—a disposition which has ever been manifested by the Government of this State; and he laments the occasion which thus compels him to yield obedience to the paramount authority of the constitution and laws. He trusts the General Government will speedily provide an adequate force for the security and protection of the sea coast. In the mean time, his Excellency has issued the necessary orders to the general officers commanding the militia in that quarter to be in readiness to repel any invasion which may be attempted upon that portion of the State, and to co-operate with such part of the national forces as shall be employed for the same purpose.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and very humble servant,

JOHN COTTON SMITH.

To the Honorable Wm. EUSTIS, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1812.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the third instant.

The absence of his Excellency Governor Griswold, on account of ill health, is seriously to be regretted, particularly at this important crisis, when his prompt assurances of obeying the requisition of the President, to call into the service of the United States such detachments of militia as might be required, conformably to the act of April 10, 1812, through General Dearborn, are intercepted and suspended by your Honor.

The reasons assigned for refusing to execute the engagements of his Excellency Governor Griswold appear not less extraordinary than the act itself.

After a declaration of war, against a nation possessed of a powerful and numerous fleet, a part of which were actually on our coast, had been promulgated, and officially communicated to the Executive of the State, the assertion made by your Honor, "that the Governor is not informed that the United States are in imminent danger of invasion," was not to have been expected. To remove all doubts from your mind on this subject, I am instructed by the President to state to you, that such danger actually exists; and to request that the requisition of General Dearborn, made by his special authority, for calling into the service of the United States certain detachments of militia from the State of Connecticut, be forthwith carried into effect.

The right of the State to officer the militia is clearly recognized in the requisition of General Dearborn. The detachments, when marched to the several posts assigned them, with their proper officers, appointed conformably to the laws of the State, will command, or be commanded, according to the rules and articles of war and the usages of service.

Very respectfully, &c.

W. EUSTIS.

His Honor Jno. C. SMITH, Governor of Connecticut.

LYME, August 13, 1812.

SIR:

His Honor Governor Smith has put into my hands your letter of the 14th of July, and it is with surprise I notice the construction you have put on my letter of the 17th of June. The unusual and exceptional terms, also, in which your letter is expressed, have not escaped notice. But a regard to the propriety of my own conduct will not allow me to descend to any comments upon its particular expressions, but leave me to perform my duty to the General Government, by giving the explanation which appears proper.

When you communicated the request of the President, that any future requisition from General Dearborn, for a part of the draughted militia, might be complied with, it remained uncertain whether such a requirement would be made, or, if made, under what circumstances it might take place.

Confident, however, that the President would authorize no requisition which was not strictly constitutional, and particularly that the order would not exceed the conditions of the act of the 10th of April, to which you had referred, I had no hesitation in giving general assurance, that the requisitions which the President might make through General Dearborn would be complied with. I then thought, as I do still, that decency, and a due respect to the first Magistrate of the Union, required that my assurance should be general, and no expression should be used which might imply a suspicion that the President would violate the constitution in his orders. I also expected that this early and general declaration would be considered as evidence of a disposition, which has been uniformly felt in this State, to execute every constitutional requisition from the General Government.

In what light, however, my expressions have been viewed, I trust there will be no future misconstruction, when I assure you, that I neither intended, or expected, to be understood, by the general language of my letter, or any expression it contained, to give the smallest assurance that I would execute any order which I judged repugnant to the constitution, from whatever source it might emanate.

The light in which I have viewed the order from General Dearborn has been already communicated by Governor Smith, and it is only proper to add, that my opinion has not changed, but is confirmed by the unanimous opinions of the Council of the State.

The new light in which you have presented the subject, in your letter to Governor Smith, has received every attention, but still my opinion remains the same. The war, which has commenced, and the cruising of a hostile fleet on our coast, is not invasion; and the declaration of the President, that there is imminent danger of invasion, is evidently a consequence drawn from the facts now disclosed, and is not, in my opinion, warranted by those facts. If such consequences were admitted to result from a declaration of war with an European Power, it would follow, that every war of that character would throw the militia into the hands of the National Government, and strip the States of the important right reserved to them. In addition to the foregoing facts, it is proper for me further to observe, that I have found it difficult to fix in my mind the meaning of the words "imminent danger of invasion," used by Congress in the act of the 28th of February, 1795, and now repeated in your letter, as no such expression is contained in that part of the constitution which authorizes the President to call the militia into service. Presuming, however, that some definite meaning, thought consistent with the constitution, was at the time annexed to the expression, I have rather inferred that the Legislature must have intended only to include an extreme case, where an enemy had not passed the line of the United States, but were evidently advancing in force to invade our country. Such a case would undoubtedly come within the spirit of the constitution, although it might not be included in its literal expression.

But whether the Congress, in 1795, were justified in the expression or not, is unimportant, there being no difficulty in the present case, as none of the facts disclosed furnish any thing more than a slight danger of invasion, which the constitution could not contemplate, and which might exist even in times of peace.

Whilst I regret this difference of opinion, on a question of such importance, I do not doubt that the President will do me the justice to believe, that a sense of duty leaves me no other course to pursue, and that every means for the defence of the State will be speedily provided for.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient and humble servant,

ROGER GRISWOLD.

ARMS PROVIDED FOR, AND ISSUED TO, THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 24, 1812.

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 18, 1812.

SIR:

In obedience to a resolution of the honorable the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, I have the honor to state, that, of the annual appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for arming the whole body of militia, conformably to the act of April 23, 1809, four hundred and eighty-three thousand dollars have been drawn from the treasury on that account. The enclosed statement from the commissary general, marked A, exhibits the contracts which have been made by the late purveyor of public supplies with sundry manufacturers, for eighty-five thousand stands of arms. On those contracts, ninety-four thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars have been advanced, and thirty-one thousand six hundred and forty stands of arms have been delivered to the United States. In addition to those contracts, an agreement was entered into by this Department on the 18th of July last, with Eli Whitney, of New Haven, Connecticut, to manufacture and deliver fifteen thousand stands of arms, in a proportion of not less than fifteen hundred annually. On this contract, five thousand dollars have been advanced. It will also appear by the statement A, that twelve thousand two hundred and fifty stands of arms have been sold to the States of Georgia, Maryland, and Delaware.

Statement B exhibits the number of arms and equipments which have been issued under the act of April 23d, 1809, for arming the whole body of militia. These issues have been made within the last year, and to those States and territories whose exposed situation appeared to require immediate supplies.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

W. EUSTIS.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the U. S.

[2d SESSION.

ADDITIONAL GENERAL OFFICERS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1813.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON CITY, 23d December, 1812.

SIR:

Before I reply to your question, "how many major generals and brigadiers are necessary for an army of thirty five thousand men?" it may not be amiss to state what is believed to have been the proportion of officers of these grades in the Revolutionary army, and what is understood to be the proportion, at this time, in European armies.

In the first army of the Revolution, raised in 1775, we had a commander-in-chief, four major generals, and eight brigadiers. In 1776, five brigadiers were promoted to the rank of major generals, and twenty-three brigadiers appointed. In 1777, six brigadiers were promoted to the rank of major generals, and three major generals and eighteen brigadiers appointed.

The loss of papers in the War Office, by fire, in 1800, renders it impossible to say, with precision, at what particular periods many of these general officers left the service, but it is within my recollection that, on the 29th of June, 1778, fourteen major generals, and sixteen brigadiers, were actually in service of the United States. Yet, by referring to the official letters of General Washington, in 1778, and 1779, it will be seen that a further increase of general officers was often and warmly recommended.

The main army, under the immediate command of General Washington, it is believed, never amounted to thirty five thousand men, and it is by no means certain that this number was ever in service at one and the same time, in the whole of what was designated "the continental army." Yet, at no period, between the first of May, 1777, and the close of the war, had we less than thirty general officers in service.

It was deemed necessary, in the Revolution, and it is understood to be the general practice in Europe, at this time, to have at least one brigadier-general for every two thousand men, and one major general for every four thousand.

In this country we have never had a grade between the commander-in-chief and that of major general; hence it was found necessary, in the "continental army," to give to the senior major general the command of the right wing, and, to the next in rank, that of the left, which, from the limited number of general officers, often left a division to a brigadier, a brigade to a colonel, and a regiment to a subordinate field officer; but, in Europe, this difficulty is obviated by the appointment of general officers of higher grades.

From the best information I have been able to obtain on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying that eight major generals, and sixteen brigadiers, to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men, is the lowest estimate which the uniform practice of France, Russia, and England, will warrant, and that this is much below the proportion of officers of these grades actually employed in the army of the Revolution.

As you have not required my opinion whether it be necessary to have a higher grade than that of major general, I have not deemed it proper to touch this subject, and have confined myself to the number of major generals, and brigadiers, deemed necessary to command the divisions and brigades of an army of thirty-five thousand men. It may not, however, be improper to remark, that, if it is intended to have no higher grade than that of major general, their number should be increased to eleven; so as to give one for the chief command, one for each wing, and one for each division of four thousand men.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. H. CUSHING, Adjutant General.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 10th, 1813.

SIR:

In reply to the letter you did me the honor to write to me, on the 5th instant, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I respectfully submit the following opinions:

1st. That an increased number of general officers is essential to the public service. The number of regiments provided for by law, is, two of light dragoons, three of heavy artillery, one of light artillery, one of riflemen, and forty-five of infantry, making, together, fifty-two regiments.

The simplest organization is ever the best. Hence it is, that, as a regiment consists of two battalions, so a brigade should consist of two regiments, and a division of two brigades.

This sphere of command will be found, in practice, sufficiently large. The management of two thousand men in the field, will be ample duty for a brigadier, and the direction of double that number will give full occupation to a major general. To enlarge the sphere of command in either grade would not be a mean of best promoting the public good.

Taking these ideas as the basis of the rule, and taking for granted, also, that our ranks are filled, the present establishment would require twenty-five brigadiers and twelve major generals. But the latter admission requires qualification, and, under existing circumstances, it may be sufficient that the higher staff should consist of eight major generals, and sixteen brigadiers.

The general argument, on this head, might be fortified by our own practice during the war of the Revolution, and by that of European nations at all times. Believing, however, that this view of the subject has been already taken by the adjutant general, in a late communication to you, I forbear to do more than suggest it.

2d. The recruiting service would be much promoted, were the bounty in land commutable into money, at the option of the soldier, and at the end of his service. This modification would be addressed to both descriptions of men—those who would prefer money, and such as would prefer land.

I need hardly remark, that bounties, at the close of service, have many advantages over those given before service begins. The former tie men down to their duty; the latter furnish, if not the motive, at least the means of debauch and desertion.

Another, and a public reason for the preference, may be found in the greater convenience with which money may be paid at the end, than at the commencement of a war.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Honorable DAVID R. WILLIAMS,
Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONTRACT PRICE OF ARMS FOR THE MILITIA,

The payments made, the sum carried to the Sinking Fund, and the balance of appropriation remaining unexpended.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 3, 1813.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 1, 1813.

SIR:

Conformably to a resolution of the honorable the Senate of the United States, of the 27th of February last, requiring the Secretary of War to cause to be laid before the Senate information on the following points:

1st. What is the contract price of the arms contracted for, under the authority of the act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States?

2d. What amount of money has been drawn from the treasury under the appropriation of the said act, at what times, and in what sums, have such moneys been drawn from the treasury?

3d. To whom, and at what times, have the moneys drawn, as aforesaid, been paid?

4th. What is the balance of the appropriation, made by the said act, remaining unexpended, and has any part of such balance, and, if any, what, sum been carried to the Sinking Fund?

5th. Has any part of the money, appropriated by the said act, been applied to the manufacture of arms in the public factories, and, if so, how much?

I have the honor to state, that the average price of arms, manufactured by private contracts, for arming the whole body of the militia of the United States, under the act of April 23d 1808, is ten dollars and seventy-five cents for each stand; that the amount of money drawn from the treasury, and expended on that account, is detailed in the enclosed statement; that one hundred thousand dollars of the appropriation has been carried to the surplus fund; that the balance remaining to the credit of the appropriation is five hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the annual sum of two hundred thousand dollars for the year 1813; and that no part of the money appropriated by the said act has been applied to the manufacture of arms in the public armories, except nine thousand seven hundred dollars at Springfield, Massachusetts.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JUNE 16, 1813.

CAMP MEIGS, May 2d, 1813.

To the Honorable the Senate of the United States. The officers undersigned (now in the service of the United States and attached to the army under the command of Major General William H. Harrison) respectfully represent:

Having observed several appointments and promotions recently made in the army, and particularly in the corps to which we severally belong, and feeling that in some of them injustice has been done officers now in service; we owe it to ourselves, as well as the service in which we are engaged, to make known to your honorable body the wrongs complained of; you alone possessing the corrective power.

Our distance from the seat of Government prevents an immediate knowledge of new arrangements, made in the War Department, but we have seen no public document authorizing (as we conceive) some of the recent appointments and promotions from that Department. If, in the promotions and new appointments in the army, the age of an officer's commission, and the duration of service are to be wholly disregarded, few men would enter the army except from necessity—a crisis, we presume, wished for by none who has the good of his country at heart.

We are unwilling to believe that your honorable body would sanction a course so destructive to the necessary excitements of a soldier, and so chilling to his laudable ambition; nor would we have troubled you with this address, had not we feared that, in the crowd of momentous matter which might occupy your attention at the present session of Congress, it might escape your consideration, that, in some of the appointments recently made, private citizens have been made Captains over the heads of subaltern officers, who have been long in service; nor is it less worthy your attention, that, in many instances, subalterns have been promoted over the heads of superior officers—over officers, too, who, from experience, as well as services rendered their country in the field of battle, have at least some claim to the ordinary and just patronage of their Government.

We are well aware that, in armies, the usages of nations sanction extraordinary and honorable notice of even private soldiers, where extraordinary and honorable deeds authorize it, and we would be the last to complain at the elevation of a brother soldier, or even a private citizen, under similar circumstances.

It is unnecessary, we conceive, to call your attention to the individual promotions and appointments, by which we feel the usages of armies, and our individual rights, violated; they must necessarily be laid before you for approval.

In thus obtruding ourselves before the Senate of the United States, we trust it will be seen that we are actuated by no other motive than that which should pervade the breast of every soldier, and that the matter and manner of this address evince the greatest respect and deference, both to your honorable body and that of the War Department.

EXTENSION OF THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 19, 1813.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 19, 1813.

SIR:

The Ordnance Department, as originally organized, consisted of one commissary general, one assistant commissary general, four deputies, and not exceeding eight assistant deputies; at the last session of Congress, an augmentation of the assistant deputies to sixteen was authorized.

The duties of the Ordnance Department, as prescribed by law, are various and important. Such as, 1. Inspecting and proving cannon, cannon shot, shells, and gun powder; 2. Superintending the construction of gun carriages, ammunition wagons, equipments for cannon, and all machines used by the artillery in garrison or field; 3. Preparing ammunition both for the artillery and infantry, and all kinds of ordnance stores; 4. Furnishing to the Secretary of War semi-annual returns, exhibiting the actual state of the ordnance and ordnance stores, throughout the United States, together with the necessary estimates of wear, tear, and expenditure, on which to found contracts and purchases to ensure future adequate supplies; 5. Visiting and inspecting the several forts, posts, and camps, in the United States, to see that the ordnance and ordnance stores are kept in serviceable order, properly distributed, and economically expended.

The Ordnance Department, as at present filled, seems inadequate to the discharge of these duties.

General Harrison has judged it necessary to appoint, on his own authority, one deputy commissary and two assistant deputies, to act with the army under his command. General Wilkinson has selected one officer of artillery to act as a deputy commissary, and appointed another ad interim to the station of assistant deputy. General Dearborn and General Bloomfield have each appointed an officer of the artillery to act in the Ordnance Department; and, lastly, General Pinckney is solicitous to have two assistant deputies appointed for the district under his command, in addition to one deputy already under his command.

It has been decided by the War Department, to establish three principal laboratories and arsenals: one at or near Albany; one at or near Pittsburgh; and one on the waters of the Chesapeake. At each of these establishments thirty or forty workmen will be employed, which will require at least one superior officer, and three or four inferior, at each station. The arsenals and laboratories will, therefore, alone, require fifteen or sixteen officers. To each military district, one deputy commissary ought at least to be allowed. My opinion, is, therefore, the deputy commissaries ought to be increased to eleven or twelve, leaving the number of assistant deputies at sixteen, as now established.

Nor should we be deterred by the idea of increased expense. In fact, a great deal of money would be saved by making systematic arrangements in relation to this branch of the service. We cannot possibly avoid these expenses; in some way or other they must be incurred. Cannon, their carriages and equipments, for our armies in the field, our posts on the frontiers, and the fixed and moveable batteries on the sea board, must be provided. Powder, shot, and shells, must at any rate be procured. The appropriations for the ordnance supplies, I am informed, amount to upwards of one million of dollars, and the future annual expenditure, during the war, will probably not be less. It is worth while to incur some expense, to ensure the faithful, judicious, and economical expenditure of such a sum of money. I know an instance where one hundred and twenty dollars per ton has, by the interference of militia officers, been paid for cannon shot on the very spot where the United States had contracted to have them delivered at seventy-two dollars per ton. Such extravagancies will be continually taking place, while chance and momentary exigencies regulate the supplies to be furnished to the military posts in our extensive country. Besides, while the Ordnance Department remains inadequate to the discharge of its duties, incessant complaints will arise of want of ammunition, want of artillery, arms, and accoutrements, and other articles essential to protection and defence.

I have the honor to be, with entire respect, sir, your obedient and very humble servant,

DECIUS WADSWORTH.

Honorable Mr. TROUP, of the House of Representatives.

ARMING THE MILITIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 8, 1813.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the House, of the 15th of June, instructing them to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," and particularly whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary as to the time when the arms procured by virtue of said act shall be distributed to each State and territory, reported:

That the funds appropriated by the act of 23d of April for arming the whole body of the militia, amounted, on the 23d day of April last, to one million of dollars; that of this sum ninety-four thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars have been actually expended; and that the whole number of arms procured, up to this day, amounts to 34,477 stands, all derived under contracts of supply; that of these the following disposition has been made, viz.

New Hampshire, - - - - -	1,000
Vermont, - - - - -	2,500
Rhode Island, - - - - -	1,000
New Jersey, - - - - -	1,000

South Carolina, - - - - -	2,000
Georgia, - - - - -	1,000
Ohio, - - - - -	1,500
Kentucky, - - - - -	1,500
Tennessee, - - - - -	1,500
Illinois territory, - - - - -	218
Louisiana, - - - - -	250

		Since the 24th December, 1812.
Connecticut, - - - - -			5,000
New York, - - - - -			2,000
Maryland, - - - - -			1,500
Louisiana, - - - - -			1,500

		Before the 24th December, 1812.
Ohio, - - - - -			1,500
District of Columbia, - - - - -			2,200

Making an aggregate of 26,000 stands delivered, and leaving a balance of 8,477 stands, subject to future distribution.

That the aforesaid disposition has been made in virtue of the authority conferred by the third section of the act of April, 1808, which is as follows: "That all the arms procured in virtue of this act shall be transmitted to the several States composing this Union, and territories thereof, to each State and territory, respectively, in proportion to the number of effective militia in each State and territory; and by each State and territory to be distributed to the militia in such State and territory, under such rules and regulations as shall be by law prescribed by the Legislature of each State and territory."

The language of this section is clear, and admits but of one construction; the proportion to which each State is entitled is secured by it; each State having contributed its just proportion of money to the purchase, each State is entitled to receive its just proportion of arms. "Shall be transmitted to each State and territory, respectively, in proportion to the number of effective militia in each State and territory. Transmitted. When? "At such time as the Executive may deem proper." This is the only construction, in the opinion of your committee, of which the language of the section is susceptible. If the intention of the Legislature had been to bind the Executive to a simultaneous or periodical transmission, the language of the section would have been different: "shall be transmitted at the same time," or "shall be transmitted annually, or biennially, or triennially," would have been the language of the Legislature. The time of transmission not being specified, therefore, but left, as your committee conclude, to a sound Executive discretion, the question is, whether any alteration in the act of April, 1808, be, in this respect, expedient.

In legislation it is extremely difficult, and frequently impossible, to foresee all the exigencies which may arise under a particular act, and, consequently, extremely difficult, and frequently impossible, to make adequate provision for them. In some cases, even the Legislature, foreseeing a possible exigency, it would be unwise to anticipate and provide for it by the express letter of the law. Would it become the Legislature of the Union, for instance, to anticipate the rebellion of a State against the authority of the United States, and to enact that "no State in actual rebellion against the United States should be entitled to receive its proportion of arms?" Your committee presume not. A legislation of this character would, to say nothing of the violence it would offer to the enlightened sensibility of the National Legislature, be the means, when frequently indulged, of bringing about that very state of things which cannot be thought of without horror, and which ought not to be spoken of at all. In every act of legislation, there fore, something must be left to implication; something must be left to discretion. But there are other considerations which, in the opinion of your committee, justify the discretion as to the time of transmission.

A war unexpectedly breaks out; a particular section is exposed to the assaults of the enemy; that section destitute of arms; shall the enemy be suffered to advance, to lay waste with fire and sword, because the President is bound by the letter of the law so to distribute the arms as that each State shall, at the same time, receive a proportion exactly equal to the number of its effective militia? No, would be the exclamation from one end of the Union to the other; let the safety of a part be consulted, though the whole suffer inconvenience. Yet, were such the letter of the law, the Executive would, under any circumstances, be bound to respect it. The act of the 23d of April, 1808, was passed in a season of profound peace; contemplating future wars, it looked to no particular war; it had just gone into operation, had scarcely developed its first fruits, when the present war broke out. The war found the militia badly armed; it found particular portions of them worse armed and more exposed than others. Would it have been wise, under these circumstances, to distribute 30,000 stands of arms equally among 800,000 militia? Or would it have been wiser to consult the wants and exposure of particular portions?

But suppose it were expedient, in the opinion of your committee, to define with precision the time of transmission; what period ought to be selected? If a yearly or biennial or triennial distribution, were adopted, it might happen, by casualty or accident, that, within the period limited, no arms were received, or so few, that the expense and trouble of distribution would exceed the expense of manufacture; and what would the distribution of a dozen or an hundred stands of arms avail the militia of a great State; they would be lost in the transmission, or suffered by the States to lie neglected and forgotten. In the distribution by the States themselves, among their own militia, it is more than probable they would be governed by the same principle as that by which the recent disposition by the United States has seemed to be regulated. Would a State having one thousand companies of militia so scrupulously consult the principle of equality, in the distribution of one thousand stand of arms, as to give one musket and bayonet to each company? It may fairly be presumed not; the wants, the frontier position, and actual exposure of particular parts of the State, would be much more likely to regulate the distribution; those of the militia, to be sure, from whom, for the moment, they were withheld, might complain of a departure from the principle of exact equality, but with what concern would the legislative body of such State regard such complaints?

For these, and various other reasons, which might be adduced, but with which your committee forbear to trouble the House, they are of opinion that, for the present at least, the act of April, 1808, requires no alterations. They are the more confirmed in this opinion, because they have reason to believe, that there has been no misconstruction of the law; that the seeming irregularity which has taken place has grown out of the exigency of the times; that a disposition exists to correct such irregularity, as soon as circumstances will admit; that the correction is, in fact, at this moment proceeding; that, in due time, all the States must and will receive their respective proportions of arms; and, in fine, that the immediate representatives of the people in Congress, inspecting, as they do, with never ceasing vigilance, the execution of this, as well as every other law, stand ready to apply the remedy whensoever right, or justice, or expediency, shall seem to them to demand it.

Sir:

COMMITTEE ROOM, June 30, 1813.

I am directed, by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom has been referred a resolution instructing them to inquire what alterations are necessary in the act of the 28th of April, 1813, providing for the arming the whole body of the militia of the United States, to ask information on the following points, viz.

1st. What number of arms have been received by the United States since the 24th day of December, 1812, under contracts or purchases, for carrying into effect the aforesaid act of the 23d April, 1808?

2d. Whether, since the 24th day of December, 1812, any further disposition has been made of the arms acquired under the act of the 23d April, 1808, and, if any further disposition, to what amount, to what States and territories, and the number to each, respectively?

3d. By what authority eight thousand one hundred stand of arms have been, as appears by a report from your Department, made to the House of Representatives, 24th December, 1812, loaned to several States and territories, and whether the arms so loaned were arms acquired under the authority of the aforesaid act of the 23d of April, 1808?

Or any other information in possession of your Department touching the distribution of arms acquired under the act of 1808, and which will enable the committee to comply with the instruction of the House.

Sir:

WAR DEPARTMENT, 6th July, 1813.

In reply to the note you did me the honor to write to me on the 30th ult. I beg leave to state, that two thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven stands of arms have been received into the public stores, since December, 1812, under contracts made pursuant to law; and that deliveries of arms, since that period, to the amount of seven thousand stands, have been made as follows, viz:

2,000 to the State of Connecticut.
2,000 to the State of New York.
1,500 to the State of Maryland.
1,500 to the State of Louisiana.

The arms stated in the report of December last to have been loaned, were in part acquired under the act of the 28th of April, 1808, viz:

1,500 delivered to Major General Wadsworth, of Ohio; and
2,200 to the District of Columbia. And are considered as furnished under that law. In the former of these cases, the exigence growing out of the surrender of General Hull did not leave to this Department time for the employment of the customary form of getting the receipt of the Governor. The balance of loaned arms (2,900) was not acquired under the aforesaid act.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my very high respect,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. Mr. TROUP.

[1st Session.]

SPIRIT AND MANNER IN WHICH THE WAR IS WAGED BY THE ENEMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 31, 1813.

Mr. MACON, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message "which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war had been waged by the enemy," made the following report:

That they have collected and arranged all the testimony on this subject which could, at this time, be procured. This testimony is submitted to the consideration of the House, arranged under the following heads:

- First. Bad treatment of American prisoners.
- Second. Detention of American prisoners as British subjects, on the plea of nativity in the dominions of Britain, or of naturalization.
- Third. Detention of mariners, as prisoners of war, who were in England when the war was declared.
- Fourth. Compulsory service of impressed American seamen on board British ships of war.
- Fifth. Violation of flags of truce.
- Sixth. Ransom of American prisoners from Indians in the British service.
- Seventh. Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake bay, and in the neighboring country.
- Eighth. Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service. Abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle, or murdered after the surrender to the British. The pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses, after surrender to the British under the guarantee of protection.
- Ninth. Outrages at Hampton, in Virginia.

The evidence under the first head demonstrates that the British Government has adopted a rigor of regulation unfriendly to the comfort, and apparently unnecessary to the safe keeping, of American prisoners, generally. It shows, also, instances of a departure from the customary rules of war, by the selection and confinement in close prisons of particular persons, and the transportation of them, for undefined causes, from the ports of the British colonies to the island of Great Britain.

The evidence under the second head establishes the fact, that, however the practice of detaining American citizens as British subjects may be regarded as to the principle it involves, that such detentions continue to occur, through the agency of the naval and other commanders of that Government. It proves, too, that, however unwilling to allow other nations to naturalize her subjects, Great Britain is disposed to enforce the obligation entered into by their citizens, when naturalized under her own laws. This practice, even supposing the release of every person thus detained, obviously subjects our captured citizens, upon mere suspicion, to hardships and perils from which they ought to be exempt, according to the established rules in relation to prisoners of war.

The evidence under the third head shows that, while all other American citizens were permitted to depart within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, all mariners who were in the dominions of Great Britain, whether they resorted to her ports, in time of peace, for lawful purposes, or were forced into them under the pretence of illegal commerce, are considered prisoners of war. The injustice of this exception is not more apparent than the jealousy it discloses towards that useful class of our fellow-citizens. But the committee can but remark, that, if the practice of hiring American seamen to navigate British vessels is generally adopted and authorized, and that it is suffered appears from the advertisements of George Maude, the British agent at Port Royal, which is to be found with the testimony collected under the first head, that the naval strength of that empire will be increased in proportion to the number of our seamen in bondage. The present war having changed the relation of the two countries, the pretended right of impressment can no longer be exercised, but the same end may be accomplished by the substitution of this mode. Every seaman thus employed (the terms of whose engagement have not been ascertained) increases the naval strength of the enemy, not only by depriving the United States of his active services, but by enabling Great Britain to carry on, and even extend, her commerce, without diminishing the number of sailors employed in her vessels of war.

The testimony collected under the fourth head proves, that it is the ordinary practice of the officers of British armed vessels to force impressed Americans to serve against their country by threats, by corporal punishment, and even by the fear of immediate execution—an instructing commentary upon the professions of the Government of its readiness to release impressed American seamen, found on board ships of war.

On the evidence collected under the fifth head it is only necessary to observe, that, in one case, (the case of Dr. M'Keenan) the enormity is increased by the circumstance of the flag being divested of every thing of a hostile character, having solely for its object the relief of the wounded and suffering prisoners who were taken at the river Raisin on the 22d January, 1813. The treatment of Dr. M'Keenan, not by the allies of Britain, but by the officers of her army, can only be rationally accounted for by the supposition, that it was considered good policy to deter American surgeons from going to the relief of their countrymen, as the Indian surgeons had a more speedy and effectual mode of relieving their sufferings.

The evidence respecting the ransom of American prisoners from Indians, collected under the sixth head, deserves attention, principally from the policy it indicates, and as it is connected with Indian cruelties. Considering the savages as an auxiliary military force in the pay of Great Britain, the amount of ransom may be regarded as part of their stipulated compensation for military services; and, as ransoms would be increased, and their value enhanced, by the terror inspired by the most shocking barbarities, it may be fairly concluded, whatever may be the intention of the British Government, that the practice of redeeming captives by pecuniary means will be occasionally quickened, by the butchery of our fellow-citizens, and by indignities offered to their remains, as long as the Indians are employed by the enemy. The justice of this conclusion is confirmed by the testimony of those witnesses who were retained after ransom as prisoners of war.

The testimony collected under the seventh head shows, that the private property of unarmed citizens has been pillaged by the officers and crews of the British vessels of war on our coast, their houses burnt, and places of public worship mutilated and defiled. It appears that the officers, animated by the presence of Admiral Cockburn, particularly distinguished themselves in these exploits. This evidence proves, that they were governed by the combined motives of avarice and revenge; not satisfied with bearing off, for their own convenience, the valuable articles found, the others, which furnished no allurements to their cupidity, were wantonly defaced and destroyed. It has been alleged, in palliation of these acts of wanton cruelty, that a flag sent on shore by the Admiral was fired upon by the American militia. The evidence proves this not to have been the fact. This pretence has been resorted to only to excuse conduct which no circumstances can justify.

The committee forbear to make any observations upon the testimony collected under the eighth head, from a perfect conviction that no person of this or any other nation can read the simple narrative of the different witnesses of the grossest violations of honor, justice, and humanity, without the strongest emotions of indignation and horror. That these outrages were perpetrated by Indians is neither palliation nor excuse. Every civilized nation is answerable for the conduct of the allies under their command, and, while they partake of the advantages of their successes, they are equally partakers of the odium of their crimes. The British forces concerned in the affair of the 22d, at the river Raisin, are more deeply implicated in the infamy of these transactions than by this mode of reasoning, however correct. The massacre of the 23d January, after the capitulation, was perpetrated without any exertion on their part to prevent it; indeed, it is apparent, from all the circumstances, that, if the British officers did not connive at their destruction, they were criminally indifferent about the fate of the wounded prisoners. But what marks more strongly the degradation of the character of the British soldiers is, the refusal of the last officer of humanity to the bodies of the dead. The bodies of our countrymen were exposed to every indignity, and became food for brutes, in the sight of men who affect a sacred regard to the dictates of honor and religion. Low, indeed, is the character of that army which is reduced to the confession that their savage auxiliaries will not permit them to perform the rites of sepulture to the slain. The committee have not been able to discover even the expression of that detestation which such conduct must inspire from the military or civil authority on the Canadian frontier, unless such detestation is to be presumed from the choice of an Indian trophy as an ornament for the legislative hall of Upper Canada.

The committee have considered it their duty to submit the evidence collected under the ninth head of the atrocities committed at Hampton, although these enormities have been committed since their appointment. These barbarities may be rationally considered as the consequence of the example set by the officers of the naval force on our coast. Human turpitude is always progressive, and soldiers are prepared for the perpetration of the most dreadful crimes by the commission of minor offences with impunity. That troops who had been instigated by the example of their officers to plunder the property and burn the houses of unarmed citizens, should proceed to rape and murder, need not excite surprise, however it may inspire horror. For every detestable violation of humanity an excuse is fabricated or found. The wounded prisoners on the Northern frontier were massacred by Indians; the sick murdered; and the women violated at Hampton, by the foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain. These prettexts, admitting them to be true, are as disgraceful as the conduct which made a resort to them necessary. Honor and magnanimity not only forbid the soldier to perpetrate crimes, but require every exertion on his part to prevent them. If, in defiance of discipline, acts of violence are committed upon any individual entitled to protection, the exemplary punishment of the offender can alone vindicate the reputation of the nation by whom he is employed. Whether such exertions were made by the British soldiers, or the character of the British nation thus vindicated, the evidence will show.

The shrieks of the innocent victims of infernal lust, at Hampton, were heard by the American prisoners, but were too weak to reach the ears or disturb the repose of the British officers, whose duty, as men, required them to protect every female whom the fortune of war had thrown into their power. The committee will not dwell on this hateful subject. Human language affords no terms strong enough to express the emotions which the examination of his evidence has awakened; they rejoice that these acts have appeared so incredible to the American people, and, for the honor of human nature, they deeply regret that the evidence so clearly establishes their truth. In the correspondence between the commander of the American and British forces will be found what is equivalent to an admission of the facts by the British commander. The committee have yet to learn that the punishment of the offenders has followed the conviction of their guilt. The power of retaliation being vested by law in the Executive Magistrate, no measure is considered necessary to be proposed but the resolution annexed to this report.

As such enormities, instead of inspiring terror, as was probably intended, are, in the opinion of the committee, calculated to produce a contrary effect, they submit, for the consideration of the House, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to have collected and presented to this House, during the continuance of the present war, evidence of every departure by the enemy from the ordinary modes of conducting war among civilized nations.

No. 1.

Bad treatment of American Prisoners by the British.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1813.

SIR:

I have received your favor of the 22d instant, and hasten to reply to the questions therein, respecting the case of Captain Jedothan Upton, late commander of the privateer brig Hunter, of Salem. Captain Upton was taken in the month, I believe, of November last, off the Western islands, by the British frigate Phœbe, Captain Hilliard. In chase, Captain Upton, as is usual in such cases, threw his guns overboard to ease his vessel, in hopes by that means to facilitate his escape from the enemy; but this not availing, he was, as above stated, taken and carried into Plymouth, in England, where, on his arrival, he was immediately, with his first lieutenant, Mr. Wayne, put into Mill prison, and refused his parole, on the plea he had not on board, when captured, fourteen mounted carriage guns above the caliber of four pounders. After having been thus closely confined for three or four months in a filthy jail, they were in the month of March taken out and sent on board the prison ship at Chatham, where, when I left England in April last, they still were, in a worse situation, if possible, than in Mill prison. The allowance, sir, to American prisoners, in England, you are acquainted with; it is, therefore, not necessary for me to mention it here. It is but justice to state, that the captain of the Phœbe petitioned the Transport Board, and used every exertion in his power to obtain the parols of Captain Upton and Mr. Wayne, but all would not do; they were deaf to his petition, lost as they are to every sentiment of honor, and every principle of humanity.

Except Captain Upton and his first lieutenant, all the rest of his officers and crew were sent on board the prison ship on their first arrival at Plymouth; amongst them was the doctor of the Hunter, Mr. Carter, who came home in the cartel Robinson Potter. What I have stated respecting the treatment of Captain Upton and Mr. Wayne, I know to be facts, as I had the honor of spending twenty-four hours in Mill prison with them, and heard those facts related by themselves.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, ALEXANDER COFFIN, Jr.

J. MASON, Esq.
Commissary General of Prisoners.

NAVY YARD, CHARLESTOWN, June 3, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose to you a deposition respecting the inhuman treatment, which Mr. Nichols, late commander of the private armed ship Decatur, belonging to Newburyport, has received from the British Government at Barbadoes. I have been credibly informed that Captain Nichols is a very respectable and correct man, therefore a fair presumption, that he has not committed himself in such a manner as ought to deprive him of the established rights of a prisoner of war. Any measure which the Government of our country may see proper to adopt in consequence of this communication, I shall readily attend to.

I have the honor, sir, to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. BAINBRIDGE.

Hon. WILLIAM JONES,
Secretary of the Navy, City of Washington.

I, James Foot, of Newburyport, in the county of Essex, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, mariner, testify and depose, that I was a prize master on board the private armed brigantine Decatur, of Newburyport, in her late cruise, William Nichols, commander that, on the 18th day of January, now last past, the said brigantine was captured by his Britannic majesty's frigate Surprise, commanded by Captain Cochran, and carried into Barbadoes. After our arrival in Barbadoes, Captain Nichols, with the other officers of the Decatur, were paroled. About two months after our arrival, his Britannic majesty's frigate Vesta arrived in Barbadoes, and through the influence of the commander of the Vesta, Captain Nichols, without any known or pretended cause, was arrested and held in close confinement, without liberty to speak to any of his officers or any other American. The place where Captain Nichols was confined, was about four feet in width, and about seven feet in length, on board a prison ship, where he remained for thirty-four days, as nearly as I can recollect, and was then taken on board his majesty's ship Tribune, and carried to England. What the cause of the unwarrantable and unjustifiable conduct of the enemy towards Captain Nichols was, I am unable to state; there were several reports in circulation; one was, that he was to be carried to England and held a prisoner until the release of certain men in France, from whom Captain Nichols recaptured his vessel, which had been taken by the British before the commencement of the present war between the two countries; another report was, that he was to be held until the close of the war, on account of his having been active against the enemy, since the commencement of hostilities, and having been fortunate in a former cruise.

JAMES FOOT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, Essex, ss.

On this thirty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord 1813, personally appeared James Foot, the subscriber to the foregoing deposition, and made solemn oath that the same is true.

Before me

JACOB GERRISH, Justice of the Peace.

Extract of a letter from the Commissary General of Prisoners, to Alexander Stewart, Esq. United States' Agent for prisoners at Jamaica, dated

MAY 1, 1813.

"I enclose you a copy of an advertisement, said to have been taken from a Jamaica newspaper, apparently put forth by the British agent for prisoners, proposing to hire out American prisoners: you will inquire into this matter, and if it be as has been stated, you will remonstrate strongly against such a practice; and inform me of the practice, and the result."

[Referred to in the preceding extract.]

PORT ROYAL, November 25, 1812.

Masters of vessels about to proceed to England with convoy, are informed that they may be supplied with a limited number of American seamen (prisoners of war) to assist in navigating their vessels, on the usual terms, by applying to

GEORGE MAUDE, Agent.

Extract from a memorial addressed to the Secretary of State, by James Orn, Joseph B. Cook, Thomas Humphries and others, masters of American vessels, who were prisoners of war in England, and returned to the United States in the cartel ship Robinson Potter.

"We shall now proceed to give as correct a statement as we can of the treatment of our countrymen (prisoners of war) by the British in England. On the arrival at Plymouth of the masters, first mates, supercargoes, and passengers, they are sent to Mill prison, for one day and night; they have an iron bedstead to sleep on, with a small mattress which might easily be put into a countryman's wallet, and a small coarse blanket. The allowance for twenty-four hours, is three small salt herrings, or about the same weight of salted cod-fish, or half a pound of beef, one and a half pounds of black bread, a little salt, &c. &c. The second day they are paroled and sent to Ashburton, twenty-four miles from Plymouth; they must pay their own expenses to get there. While they are there they are allowed 1s. 3d. per diem, or 8s. 9d. sterling per week. Beef is 10d. per pound, bread in proportion, and every other necessary equally dear. The mates, who have nothing but their pay to live upon, join together, eight or ten in a mess, hire a room, and do their own cooking, washing, &c. &c. and in this way make out to keep from starving. Masters, supercargoes, and passengers, generally, have other resources, through their correspondents in England, and make out to live, by great economy, at from 30s. to 35s. sterling per week; the second mates and other officers are sent on board the different prison ships. On board some of them they are treated by the commanding officer as well as the nature of their situation will admit; on board of some others, they are very badly treated. This, it will naturally occur to you, sir, is owing to the different characters of the different commanders. Their allowance is 10½lb. brown bread, 2½lb. beef, 2lb. bad fish, 2lb. potatoes, and 10 ounces barley per week for each man, and 5 ounces salt per week for ten men. The prison ships are kept very filthy, and the prisoners are confined below at 4 P. M. and are kept in that situation until 7 or 8 A. M. At Portsmouth, particularly, they are very sickly, and we are informed die very fast, some days from eight to ten; in fact, they are very sickly on board all of them; several of this description came home with us in the Robinson Potter cartel, and had, when they came on board, the appearance of having made their escape from a church yard. It is not perhaps amiss, that we should state what we firmly believe; that is, it is the policy of the British Government to select the sickly to be first sent in cartels, and keep the hale and hardy seamen until they become sickly; thus rendering the whole of those gallant sons of Neptune, who escape death, when they return to their homes, at least for some time, perfectly useless to themselves, and quite so to their country, from their debilitated state; and in fact, the probability is, that many of them will carry to their graves the indelible stamp upon their constitutions of the treatment which they received on board British prison ships: for that nation seems to have lost its boasted humanity, and if we did not find the word in their vocabulary, we should suppose it had never found a place there. Many of the seamen, prisoners on board those prison ships, are impressed Americans, who have given themselves up, refusing to fight against their country. Four hundred on board the fleet in the Mediterranean, a short time before we left England, surrendered themselves and were sent to Gibraltar and England; several of them were most severely flogged for refusing to do their duty, were put in irons, and most of them, to their immortal credit, submitted to the severest punishment in preference to assist the enemies of their country. Some of us, whose signatures are annexed, were witnesses to the cruel fact. A tablet of gold is not rich enough to inscribe the names of such men upon; and when a country can boast of such seamen, she has nothing to fear from the enemy on the ocean on an equal footing. Captain Jeduthan Upton, late master of the private armed brig Hunter, of Salem, of fourteen guns, because he threw them overboard in chase, was not allowed his parole, but kept in close confinement for a long time in Mill prison, and lately has been sent on board a prison ship at Chatham. We mention these facts in hopes that government will retaliate exactly in the same way. Captain Samuel Turner, late master of the Purse schooner, of New York, was taken on his passage to France, in October, 1811, prior to the war, and in retaking his vessel, the prize master, a British midshipman, was killed; he arrived safely in France, and on his return to America, was again taken, in June, 1812, and sent to England, when being recognised, he was immediately arrested and sent on board the St. Salvador, Admiral Calder's flag ship, at Plymouth, where he remained a close prisoner until about January or February last, when he was sent on board the prison ship at Chatham, where we fear he will remain until death relieves him: he has been very ill treated, much abused, put in irons, and after, threatened to be hanged. These facts, some of us who sign this were witness to. We pray, in the name of justice, that Government will take, without delay, the case of Captain Turner into their serious consideration; it is a case which we think demands it; and the only way to prevent that nation from committing further outrages so degrading to human nature. We find in Roman history, that an injury or insult offered to a Roman citizen by a foreign Power, was considered as an insult offered to the whole Roman nation, and hope this will also be the American creed, because we believe it will be the surest way of putting a stop to those indignities which Americans have so often been obliged to suffer. We are, however, no advocates for cruelty, but, on the contrary, for lenity; yet we still believe, that in certain cases retaliation is not only necessary, but becomes a duty to prevent further cruelties on the part of an enemy."

NASSAU, November 27, 1812.

DEAR BROTHER:

I embrace this, the earliest, opportunity of communicating to you, that, on the 9th instant, fifteen days out, we fell in with and captured the fine copper bottomed ship Venus, vessel and cargo worth at least twenty-five thousand dollars. On the 12th, pursuing our course, and within five days' run of your place, we were captured by his Majesty's sloop Moselle, George Moubray, commander, and brought into this place. We remained on board the sloop two or three days, and on the 19th were transferred from thence to the prison ship, where we are now imprisoned, with an allowance of six ounces of bread, three gills of rice, eight ounces of the worst of beef, including bone, which is as much as meat, with as much brackish water as we can use; guarded day and night by ten or fifteen savage Africans, who are total strangers to humanity, and confined every evening at sun-down, not to be released until next morning sun-rise, abused to the lowest degree by the guard, and compelled to find salt for, and cook, our own victuals with green mangoes. None of us are ever permitted, under any conditions whatever, to visit the shores, with many other barbarous acts, which are too numerous to describe. This will be conveyed by the cartel sloop, captain Cooper, being the second cartel which has sailed since our arrival here. A schooner from Baltimore was only allowed eight men, and Cooper, who brought sixty-four prisoners, is only allowed eighteen in return, while we, eighteen in number, are detained in this miserable place; for which we cannot assign any reason, except to punish us as privateersmen, or as hostages for those twelve lately detained in Charleston; this last is the general belief, and as such, I deem a communication of the circumstance essential to Commodore Dent, commander of the southern station, that he may look to it and inquire the cause why Americans are to be detained here two or three months, while more prisoners have been received here, by a great many, than what have been sent to the United States. Men who have arrived here since we, have been sent off; they proceed with no degree of regularity in the exchange of prisoners, and act in open contradiction to every thing right, and really believe, that except you make known the circumstances, and use some favorable exertions, that some of us will be intentionally detained until the end of our present contest with Great Britain. As I wish your exertions for our exchange, I have subjoined a list of those who are thus miserably treated, that we may be demanded in a proper way. The Rapid's crew have been imprisoned here near three months, and have now no prospect of getting away, while the crews of two other privateers have been released.

I wrote Mr. Peck and requested him to forward me a letter of introduction to some one here, and also a protection showing that I am an American. As it is possible that he may not get my letter, you will notice my request and pay that attention which it deserves. I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Peck, that any funds which I received here would be returned on application, as my expenditures will, through an economical principle, be as small as possible. I indulge the hope that you will conform to my wishes in this particular, and also inform Mr. Kelly of our imprisonment here, and request his influence in facilitating our exchange, with any other service.

We have no chance of gaining information here. Every person uses every exertion to keep us in ignorance; however, we are enabled to say, that the English prisoners have generally combined in speaking of the treatment they received in the United States.

I am, your affectionate brother,

WILLIAM L. ROBESON.

Capt. THOMAS J. ROBESON.

N. B. The Moselle, Rhodian, and Variable, three men of war, have just convoyed five or six vessels over the bar, bound to some port of England; it is supposed that they will return to cruise off Charleston. In case you address or send any thing for me to this place, you will direct to the care of Messrs. Bain, Dunshe, & Co. merchants here.

SIR:

Annexed is Captain Samuel Chew's deposition, taken before Judge Edwards at New Haven. We expected it in season to have forwarded it by Mr. Dodd, but received it last evening by Mr. Huntington, the United States' Attorney for Connecticut district, and now forward it to you per mail.

Yours, respectfully,

LUTHER SAVAGE & Co.

HON. JAMES MONROE.

CONNECTICUT DISTRICT, ss.

On this day, the 7th of May, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirteen, personally came before me, Pierpont Edwards, Judge of the district court of the United States, for the district aforesaid, Samuel Chew, of the city of New Haven, in the said district, and being duly sworn, deposed, That he was at Bridgetown, in the Island of Barbadoes, in the West Indies, in the month of February now last past; that on board a British prison ship, at Barbadoes, there were confined about five hundred and twenty-three American prisoners, of the crews of private armed vessels of the United States and merchantmen, captured since the war. At the time the deponent was at Barbadoes the American prisoners were supplied with bread and some meat; as to vegetables, the deponent was not informed. The regulations on board the said prison ship compelled the prisoners to go below decks, where they were confined at evening and until morning; as many as could were suspended in hammocks, and still there was not sufficient room below them for all to lie down. In this respect the situation of the prisoners was not only extremely uncomfortable, but hazardous, and more especially, should there be, as was apprehended, a scarcity of provisions during the approaching hot months. The deponent was not permitted to go on board said prison ship, but derived his information from masters of vessels, prisoners at said island, who were allowed occasionally to go on board said prison ship, with whom the deponent is personally acquainted, and in whose representations he has the most perfect confidence, and entertains no doubt of the facts by them stated; and this statement is given at the request of the friends of some of the prisoners at Barbadoes, particularly of the crew of the privateer Blockade, at Hartford.

PIERPONT EDWARDS, District Judge of Connecticut District.

I, Pierpont Edwards, Judge of the district court of the United States for the Connecticut district, do hereby certify and make known to all whom it may concern, that Captain Samuel Chew, the within named deponent, is a gentleman to me well known, having known him for many years: he is the son of Captain Samuel Chew, late of the city of New Haven, deceased, and who fell by a cannon ball on board an American vessel during the revolutionary war: that the said deponent is a man of strict integrity, and attached to the constitution and Government of the United States, and the most perfect confidence is due to his said representations so as aforesaid sworn to.

PIERPONT EDWARDS, District Judge of Connecticut District.

MILVILLE PRISON, August 30, 1812.

SIR: We, the subscribers, for ourselves and our countrymen, now confined as prisoners of war in Milville prison, Halifax, Nova Scotia, beg leave to represent to the American Government, that most of us have, for years past, made commerce our sole employment and hope, in which, for seven years or more, we have often been wantonly robbed by the English of what we had acquired by industry and danger, and while they striped us of our property, they often treated us with the greatest indignity, and even barbarity.

We have seen and known that they have often violated the sacred privilege of individual liberty and the law of nations; we are conscious of the long forbearance of our Government, and their repeated calls upon the honor and justice of the British nation, which, instead of redress, added other injuries; and when the hope of amicable remuneration had failed, and for retaliation our Government was forced to the last resort, an appeal to arms, we felt the justness of our cause, and hoped for the blessing of Heaven for success. To serve our country and to make up the losses which we had sustained, we, under commissions from the President of the United States, entered on board of privateers, and have unfortunately been captured by the British. We would state, that, in many instances after we had struck our colors, we were fired upon by cannon and muskets, by broadsides and volleys, and some of our men killed, and after our captors had come on board, some of us have been struck and severely wounded with cutlasses, without the least provocation for such inhumanity. Our American protections have been forced from us and destroyed, and some native American citizens have been taken out of our privateers and put on board British ships, and there obliged to serve. Most of us have been robbed of every thing, even of necessary clothing. When we were going from the ships to prison, the officers would not permit us to take our clothing and baggage with us, but pledged themselves that they should be sent to prison; but, disregarding their honor, we have lost all. Some of us have been marched thirty, and some sixty, and some one hundred and sixty miles over a miserable country, forced along beyond our strength, half starved, and some in irons. Our allowance, each man per day, one pound and a half of bread, a half pound of poor beef, well proportioned with bone, one gill of peas, one-third of an ounce of salt. We are without wearing apparel and without money, or any means of procuring them. A cold winter in this wretched country fast approaches, and in our destitute situation we must endure every thing, and many of us must perish. There are now of us in prison upwards of twelve hundred. Every art has been practised by the English officers to excite disaffection in our men to the American Government, and to induce them to enter into the English service. Necessity may oblige some to desert us and enter into British servitude, but we trust that speedy relief from our Government will save them from that wretched alternative of perishing with want or joining our enemies. For ourselves and the rest of the prisoners, we must say, we have now no fortunes to devote to the service of our country, but we have hearts which yet feel warmly the general impulse, and which we pledge, if opportunity ever again presents, to devote in the interest and service of our country.

We are now sufferers, but we will cheerfully suffer every hardship of war rather than sue for dishonorable peace. We respectfully request an exchange or some provision for relief. We feel the fullest confidence in our Government, and that we need only to apprise them of our situation to ensure their assistance and protection.

No. 2.

Detention of American Prisoners as British subjects.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PRISONERS,

WASHINGTON, June 10, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the copy of a letter from Captain Stewart, commanding the United States' naval forces at Norfolk, dated the 20th of May, to Admiral Warren, and that of a letter from Rear Admiral Cockburn, dated the 21st of May, in reply, relative to a most unjustifiable act of Commodore Berresford, as to part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, at the mouth of the Delaware. Leaving the general question of the interference of Commodore Berresford with these prisoners of war returning on parole, and the exaction made by him in consequence of the irregular power thus assumed, on the ground on which Captain Stewart has very properly placed it, I will remark, that Captain Stewart was certainly misapprehended by Admiral Cockburn, in attributing to him the intention of conveying a threat, as to the final detention of two of the American prisoners. On the contrary, the expression used by Captain Stewart communicates, in very plain terms, the decision of this Government, then already made, that four of his Britannic Majesty's subjects should be immediately selected and held in durance, subject to the same treatment in all respects, &c.

And I have now to inform you, sir, that, in virtue of this decision, and by an order from this office, the marshal of Massachusetts has designated, and placed in close confinement, William Kitto, carpenter, and Thomas Beddingfield, boatswain of the late British packet Swallow, and John Squirrel and James Russel, seamen of the Dragon seventy-four, subjects of his Britannic Majesty, to be held responsible for the safety of John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, part of the crew of the late United States' brig Vixen.

I flatter myself, sir, that this subject will command your early attention, and that you will cause the officer and seamen of the Vixen to be immediately released and returned to this country, according to their destination when taken from the cartel.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MASON.

To Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY, &c.

H. M. S. POICTIERS, May 8, 1813.

SIR:

I am sorry I am under the necessity of detaining John Stevens and John King, late of the Vixen, in consequence of their being British subjects.

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,

J. P. BERRESFORD.

To Lieutenant DRAYTON.

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE CONSTELLATION,
Off Norfolk, May 20, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to represent to your Excellency, that a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen, returning from Jamaica on parole as prisoners of war, were, on entering the Delaware, taken out of the flag of truce by Commodore Berresford, commanding on that station, and detained until a part of the crew of the Poictiers, then prisoners at Philadelphia, were demanded by him and sent down in exchange; that ultimately he detained on board the Poictiers John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, late of the United States' brig Vixen, on plea of their being subjects of his Britannic Majesty.

This violation of the rights of prisoners on parole is so contrary to the usage of all civilized nations, that I trust your Excellency will give such instructions upon that head as will prevent a similar violation in future.

I have it in command, from my Government, to state to your Excellency that, in retaliation for so violent and unjust a procedure, on the part of Commodore Berresford, in detaining the above Mr. John Stevens and Thos. King, that four subjects of his Britannic Majesty will be immediately selected and held in durance, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, which may be shown towards the aforesaid two persons during their detention. I hope your Excellency will give this subject your earliest attention, and direct the release of Mr. Stevens and Thomas King, who have been so improperly detained on board the Poictiers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

CHARLES STEWART,

Commanding Officer of the United States' Naval forces at Norfolk.

To his Excellency the Right Hon. Sir JOHN B. WARREN,

Admiral of the Blue, and Commander-in-chief of H. B. Majesty's Naval forces on the American station.

HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP MARLBOROUGH,
In Lynhaven Bay, May 21, 1813.

SIR:

In the absence of Sir John Warren, I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter under date of the 20th current, complaining of the conduct of Commodore Berresford towards some American prisoners of war returning to Philadelphia on parole, and of his having detained on board the Poictiers Mr. John Stevens and Thomas King.

No report of these circumstances have yet reached Sir John Warren or myself from Commodore Berresford; but I have no hesitation in assuring you, sir, that every inquiry would have been made into them, and every satisfaction and explanation thereon, which the case might have required, would have been offered to your Government and yourself, with the least possible delay, had it not been for the threat with which your representation on this subject is accompanied, the tenor of which being likely to produce an entire change in the aspect of our communications, and particularly in what relates to the individuals which the fate of war has placed within the power of our respective nations, it totally precludes the possibility of my now entering further into the subject than to assure you your letter shall be transmitted to the right honorable the Commander-in-chief by the earliest opportunity, and whenever his answer arrives it shall be forwarded to you without delay.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high consideration, your most obedient humble servant,

G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral.

Capt. STEWART, commanding the Naval forces of the United States at Norfolk.

SHARK, PORT ROYAL, (Jamaica) March 29, 1813.

SIR:

Captain Moubray, of his Majesty's sloop Moselle, has just sent to me the copy of a letter from you to him, and another to Mr. Cook, of his Majesty's late sloop Rhodian, dated the 25th ult., respecting six men* mentioned in the margin, who were sent here from the Bahamas as having been taken in the American privateer Sarah Ann, and supposed to be subjects of his Majesty; but, as no proof to what country they belong has been adduced, it has never been my intention to bring them to trial, and they are at present on board the prison ships, waiting an exchange of prisoners.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CHARLES STIRLING, Vice Admiral.

CHARLES R. SIMPSON, Esq.

HARLEM, June 1, 1813.

SIR:

I beg leave to refer you to a communication which took place some time in the autumn or winter preceding, between Mr. Baker, his Majesty's late agent for prisoners of war, and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, respecting six of the crew of the late American privateer Sarah Ann, Richard Moore, master, captured by his Majesty's sloop Rhodian, John George Ross, Esq. commander, whose names* are inserted in the margin, and who, it appears, were sent to Jamaica, to which station the Rhodian belonged, on suspicion of their being subjects of his Majesty. And I further request your attention to a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated Head Quarters, Charleston, 4th of November, 1812, from which it appears that twelve of his Majesty's subjects, then prisoners of war at Charleston, were held in prison to answer in their persons for the fate of the six men, of the Sarah Ann privateer, sent to Jamaica.

I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding his Majesty's ships of war on the Jamaica station, to Mr. Simpson, late sub-agent for prisoners of war at Charleston, from which you will perceive, that the six men of the Sarah Ann are considered by the admiral as American prisoners generally, and are now on board a prison ship, in common with other American prisoners.

* Edward Dick, Thomas Rodgers, Adam Taylor, Jonn Gaul, Mike Piuck, Geo. G. Roberts.

Having given you this information with respect to the six men of the Sarah Ann privateer, I have to request you will take the necessary measures to have the contingent responsibility which it was thought proper to attach to the persons of twelve British seamen, now in prison at Charleston, taken off, and that they may be informed thereof.

I understand that John Gaul, one of the six men, was paroled, and arrived at Georgetown, South Carolina, in the brig Cyprus, and that he has reported himself to the marshal, who informed Mr. Simpson "that he had sent on to the Department of State his parole."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most humble servant,

THOS. BARCLAY.

General MASON.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PRISONERS,

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1813.

SIR:

I learn, with pleasure, by the letter you did me the honor to address me on the 1st instant, and the letter from Admiral Stirling you have enclosed, that the six men belonging to the American privateer Sarah Ann, detained in October last, and sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects, have been restored to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, to wait an exchange, and that there is now no intention to bring them to trial.

I very cheerfully comply with your request, sir, and have this day directed the marshal of South Carolina to restore, in like manner, to the ordinary state of prisoners of war, the twelve British seamen, confined under the orders of this Government, by him, and to inform them that the responsibility attached to their persons for the safety of the men of the Sarah Ann has been taken off.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MASON.

Colonel THOMAS BARCLAY.

CHILLICOTHE, June 8, 1813.

SIR:

I feel it my duty to lay before you the case of William M'Dowel Scott, late of Detroit, an unfortunate fellow citizen who has been seized and apprehended by the British commanding officer at Detroit and sent to Quebec, where he is now confined under pretence of being a British subject, and one found in arms in behalf of the United States against that Government.

William M'Dowel Scott is a native of Ireland, and emigrated to the United States about eighteen years since. He resided for some years in the State of New York, and in the summer of 1800, he came to Detroit, established himself as a physician, and has ever since resided there. He has been naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States, and this fact is well known to the British Government; and both in the territory of Indiana, before that territory was divided, and subsequently in the territory of Michigan, he has held and filled with respect and fidelity some of the first offices in those two territories.

Such, for example, as a justice of the peace and a judge of the common pleas in the Indiana territory, and subsequently marshal of the territory of Michigan.

In all these offices, sir, and in every other situation, in which Doctor Scott's public and political character has been or can be viewed, he has uniformly manifested an undeviating attachment to the principles of our constitution and the administration of this Government.

His support, in the present cause, during the time that General Hull lay at Sandwich and Detroit, was not outdone by any person whatever. In fact it was his unwearied exertions that have provoked and spirited up the British to that line of conduct and persecution they are now pursuing towards him.

Proctor, who sent him from Detroit, and Sir George Prevost, who received him at Fort George and forwarded him to Quebec, threaten to treat him with all the severities authorized by the laws of nations and the usages of war, in cases of an actual bona fide British subject found in arms against that Government.

I do not, for myself, however, entertain a belief that they will dare to put their threats in execution to their full extent. But, sir, without the interference of the Government, they will detain him during the war, and they will make his life so wretched and miserable that death would be a welcome messenger.

I hope, sir, the occasion will be a sufficient apology for obtruding this communication upon you. I am amongst the number of those who have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with you. But General Taylor, who I look to as the bearer of it, is a gentleman to whom I am personally known, and who has likewise a pretty correct knowledge of the character of Doctor Scott.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

E. BRUSH.

The Honorable JAMES MONROE, Esq.

Extract of a letter from John Mitchell, Esq. agent for American prisoners of war at Halifax, to the Secretary of State, dated May 28th, 1813.

"I have just been informed by the agent for prisoners, that Mr. John Light, of the Julian Smith, a privateer commanded by Captain Henry Cooper, will be detained here in consequence of his having, previous to the war, taken the oath of allegiance in this province, (Nova Scotia) and commanded a vessel out of this place (Halifax.) Mr. Light was lieutenant of the privateer when captured by the Nymph, the 12th May, 1813."

H. M. S. POICTIERS, May 8th, 1813.

SIR:

I am sorry I am under the necessity of detaining J. Stevens and T. King, late of the Vixen, in consequence of their being British subjects.

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,

J. P. BERRESFORD.

To Lieut. DRAYTON.

The original is in the possession of the commissary general of prisoners.

W. JONES.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1813.

SIR:

You are hereby authorized and instructed to address a letter to Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren, representing the following facts and determination, viz. That a part of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen were returning from Jamaica, on parole, as prisoners of war, and entering the Delaware, when Commodore Berresford caused them to be brought on board the Poictiers, and detained until a part of the crew of that ship, whom he demanded in exchange, were sent down from Philadelphia; that ultimately, he detained John Stevens, carpenter, and Thomas King, seaman, two of the aforesaid crew of the Vixen, on the plea of their being British subjects, as appears by a letter from Commodore Berresford to Lieutenant Drayton, late first of the said brig Vixen; and that you are commanded explicitly to declare, that, in retaliation for the violent and unjust detention of the said John Stevens and Thomas King, the Government of the United States will immediately cause four British subjects to be selected and held in duress, subject to the same treatment, in all respects, that the said John Stevens and Thomas King may receive during their detention.

On the receipt of the admiral's answer, you will communicate the same to me without delay.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. JONES.

CHARLES STEWART, Esq. Commanding Naval Officer, Norfolk, Va.

Col. W. Scott to the Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1813.

SIR: I think it my duty to lay before the Department, that, on the arrival at Quebec of the American prisoners of war, surrendered at Queenstown, they were mustered and examined by British officers appointed to that duty, and every native born of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland sequestered and sent on board a ship of war then in that harbor. The vessel, in a few days thereafter, sailed for England, with those persons on board.

Between fifteen and twenty persons were thus taken from us, principally natives of Ireland, several of whom were known by their platoon officers to be naturalized citizens of the United States, and others to have been long residents within the same. One in particular, whose name has escaped me, besides having complied with all the conditions of our naturalization laws, was represented by his officers to have left a wife and five children, all of them born within the State of New York.

I distinctly understood, as well from the officers who came on board the prison ship for the above purpose, as from others, with whom I remonstrated on this subject, that it was the determination of the British Government, as expressed through Sir George Prevost, to punish every man, whom it might subject to its power, found in arms against the British King contrary to his native allegiance.

I have the honor to be, &c.

W. SCOTT, Lieutenant Colonel United States' 2d Artillery.

Mr. Beasley to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 1st, 1813.

SIR: Annexed you have a copy of a letter from Henry Kelly, in behalf of himself and twenty-two persons. He states that they are all citizens of the United States, and have wives and families there; that they were taken last October, in Upper Canada, and that they were sent to this country because they were born within the British dominions.

I am, respectfully, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

On board H. M. S. Namur, lying at the Nore, February 6, 1813.

SIR: This is to inform you of the under named twenty-three American soldiers belonging to the 13th, 6th, and 1st regiments of the United States' armies. We were taken on the 13th of October, in Upper Canada. The reason of their sending us twenty-three here, is, we were born in the British dominions, though we are all citizens of the United States, and have our wives and children there. We are in a very miserable situation for clothing, having drawn no winter clothes before we were taken. We therefore hope you will send us some relief to shelter us from the inclemency of the weather.

Sir, I remain your obedient servant,

HENRY KELLY.

Extract of a letter from Admiral Sir John Borlase Warren to the Secretary of State, dated

BERMUDA, March 8, 1813.

"I must refer you to my letter of the 30th of September, 1812, in which I stated the circumstance of twelve men being taken to the Guerriere, taken out of a cartel by Commodore Rodgers, and illegally detained, upon the pretext of six others, who were supposed to be British subjects, having been sent to the United Kingdom for examination; since that event, five of these people, named in the enclosed list, have been received at Halifax, with orders for their discharge. I therefore request you will communicate these particulars to the President, in order that further directions may be given respecting the Guerriere's men, so long confined at Boston, and to obviate the other inconveniences which must inevitably arise from such practices."

The Secretary of State to Admiral Warren (extract) dated April 16, 1813.

"It appears by your letter (of the 8th of March from Bermuda) that five only of the seamen that were taken on board the Nautilus and sent to England, in confinement have been returned. No account is given of the sixth. Orders have been issued for the release of ten of the twelve men, who, on the principle of retaliation, were confined by Commodore Rodgers at Boston. You will be sensible that it will be impossible, on that principle, to discharge the other two men until the sixth American seaman is returned, or such an explanation given of the cause of his detention, as, according to the circumstances of the case, regarding the conduct of the British Government towards American seamen under similar circumstances, ought to be satisfactory."

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant F. H. Babbitt to Master Commandant Wm. M. Crane, of the United States' Navy, (late of the United States' brig Nautilus,) dated

BOSTON, Mass. 13th September, 1812.

Enclosed I send you a description of the proportion of our little crew, who have been so debased and traitorous as to enter the service of our enemy. Also, a list* of those gallant fellows, whose glory it would have been to have lost their lives in the service of their country, and whose misfortune it has been to cross the Atlantic on suspicion of their being British subjects: four of them, native born Americans, and two naturalized citizens. On their parting with me, and removal from the Africa of 64 guns to the Thetis frigate, (the latter with a convoy from England, then in 43 30 N. and 46 30 W.) their last request and desire was, that I would particularly acquaint you with their situation, with their determination never to prove traitors to that country whose flag they were proud to serve under, and whose welfare and prosperity they equally hoped and anticipated to realise.

F. H. BABBITT.

A list of men said to have entered on board his Britannic Majesty's frigate Shannon, Commodore Broke. Their description, as far as known.

Jesse Bates, seaman; about five feet nine inches high, dark hair and complexion, dark snapping eyes, has an impediment in his speech, and at times affects lunacy; has a wife and family in Boston, Massachusetts.

Samuel Lang, marine, born in Kentucky, five feet eight inches high, or thereabouts, and is supposed to be with captain Hall, of the United States' marines, New York.

John Young, marine, five feet five inches high, large mouth, enlisted with captain Hall, Navy Yard, New York; when addressed, or is addressing an officer, casts down his eyes. For his particular description, as well as that of John Rose, marine, about five feet eight inches high, brown hair, full face, thick set, and a scowl in his countenance, refer to captain John Hall.

John O'Neal, seaman, about twenty-five years of age, five feet five inches high, dark hair, sharp face, dark eyes, thick set, and was shipped at Norfolk, Virginia, previous to your taking command of the Nautilus.

William Jones, ordinary seaman, about five feet eight inches high, light hair, twenty-four years of age, full face, thick set, downcast look, and is a very alert man; entered at New York, April last.

F. H. B.

Sir John Borlase Warren to Mr. Monroe.

HALIFAX, 30th September, 1812.

SIR:

Having received information that a most unauthorized act has been committed by Commodore Rodgers, in forcibly seizing twelve British seamen, prisoners of war, late belonging to the Guerriere, and taking them out of the English cartel brig Endeavor, on her passage down the harbor of Boston, after they had been regularly embarked on board of her for exchange, agreeable to the arrangements settled between the two countries, and that the said British seamen, so seized, are now detained on board the United States' frigate President, as hostages; I feel myself called upon to request, sir, your most serious attention to a measure so fraught with mischief and inconvenience, destructive of the good faith of a flag of truce, and the sacred protection of a cartel. I should be extremely sorry that the imprudent act of an officer should involve consequences so particularly severe as the present instance must naturally produce if repeated; and although it is very much my wish, during the continuance of the differences existing between the two countries, to adopt every measure that might render the effect of war less rigorous, yet in another point of view, the conviction of the duty I owe my country would, in the event of such grievances, as I have already stated, being continued, not admit of any hesitation in retaliatory decisions: but as I am strongly persuaded of the high liberality of your sentiments, and that the act complained of, has originated entirely with the officer who committed it, and that it will be as censurable in your consideration as it deserves, I rely upon your taking such steps as will prevent a recurrence of conduct so extremely reprehensible in every shape.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration,

Sir, your most obedient and most faithful humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, and Commander in Chief, &c.

His Excellency JAMES MONROE, Esq. Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to Sir John Borlase Warren.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 28, 1812.

SIR:

I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th September, complaining that Commodore Rodgers, commanding a squadron of the United States' navy at the port of Boston, had taken twelve British seamen, lately belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship the Guerriere, from a cartel in the harbor of Boston, and that he detained them on board the President, a frigate of the United States, as hostages.

I am instructed to inform you that inquiry shall be made into the circumstances attending, and the causes which produced, the act of which you complain, and that such measures will be taken, on a knowledge of them, as may comport with the rights of both nations, and may be proper in the case to which they relate.

I beg you, sir, to be assured, that it is the sincere desire of the President, to see (and to promote, so far as depends on the United States) that the war which exists between our countries be conducted with the utmost regard to humanity.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Sir JOHN BORLASE WARREN, Admiral of the Blue, and Commander in Chief, &c.

WASHINGTON, December 17, 1812.

SIR:

I have the honor to annex a list of twelve of the crew of the late United States' sloop of war Wasp, detained by Captain John Berresford, of the British ship Poictiers, under the pretence of their being British subjects.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

GEORGE S. WISE, Purser.

The Honorable PAUL HAMILTON, Secretary of the Navy.

*This list not received.

List referred to in the preceding Note.

John M'Leod,	-	boatswain,	-	Has been in the service since 1804. Married in Norfolk in 1804 or 5, and has a wife and four children there.
John Stephens,	-	boatswain's mate,	-	Has been in the service five or six years.
Geo. M. D. Read,	-	quartermaster,	-	Has a protection, and has sailed out of New York and Philadelphia for several years.
William Mitchell,	-	seaman,	-	The greater number, if not all, had protections at the time of entering and being taken. Two others were detained, John Wade and Thomas Hutchins, but were given up—the former on Captain Jones assuring Captain Berresford he knew him to be a native citizen; the latter on a like assurance from D. Rodgers. William Mitchell was in the service during 1805—6 in the Mediterranean.
James Gottright,	-	do.	-
John Wright,	-	do.	-
Thomas Philips,	-	do.	-
Peter Barron,	-	do.	-

Extract of a letter from Major General Pinckney to the Secretary of War, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, CHARLESTON, November 4, 1812.

"Information having been given upon oath to Lieutenant Grandison, who, at present, commands the naval department here, that six American seamen, who had been taken prisoners on board our privateers, had been sent to Jamaica to be tried as British subjects for treason, he called upon the marshal to retain double that number of British seamen as hostages. The marshal, in consequence of instructions from the Department of State, asked my advice on the subject, and I have given my opinion that they ought to be detained, until the pleasure of the President shall be known. The testimony of Captain Moon is herewith. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to have this business put in the proper train to have the President's pleasure on this subject communicated to the marshal."

Copy of a letter from Captain Moon, of the privateer Sarah Ann.

NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, October 14, 1812.

Six of my crew, claimed as British subjects, were this day taken out of jail and put on board His Majesty's brig the Sappho, and sailed for Jamaica, where, it is said, they are to be tried for their lives; consequently, I questioned each respectively as to the place of their nativity, and title to protection by the American Government, when they stated as follows, to wit:

David Dick, seaman, that he was born in the north of Ireland, but has resided in the United States ever since the year 1793; has served ten years in the United States' navy, viz: On board the frigates Chesapeake, President, Constitution, John Adams, and schooner Enterprise, and gun boat No. 2. David Dick, shoemaker, in Alexandria, is his uncle. Dick is about five feet six and a half inches high, dark hair, has a scar on his left elbow, and one on each wrist; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

John Gaul, seaman, says he was born in Marblehead, State of Massachusetts; where his parents, brothers, and sisters, now reside; is married in New York, and his wife (Mary Gaul) lives in Roosevelt street, No. 37; has a regular discharge from the navy of the United States, by Captain Hugh G. Campbell, dated at St. Mary's, Georgia, 14th August, 1812; says he has served on board the United States' brig Vixen, gun boats No. 10 and 158, from the last of which he was discharged. Gaul is 27 years of age, about five feet seven inches high, brown hair, light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

Michael Pluck, ordinary seaman, says he was born in Baltimore; his parents are dead, but is known by William Douland, Thomas Turner, and McDonald of Baltimore; has a sister in some part of Pennsylvania, whose name is Ann Welsh; was never at sea before; never had a protection. Pluck is twenty-six years old, five feet six and a half inches high, and has a scar on his left cheek bone; entered on board the Sarah Ann at Baltimore.

Thomas Rodgers, seaman, says that he was born in Waterford, Ireland, but has resided many years in the United States, and has been duly naturalized, a copy of which naturalization is filed in the custom house at Baltimore; is known by Joseph Carey and Tom. Rodgers, cork cutter, both of Baltimore; has a wife and three children in Baltimore; has lost his protection, but requests Joseph Carey to do all he can to effect his discharge from the British. Rodgers entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore.

George Roberts, a colored man and seaman. This man I had not an opportunity of questioning; but I know him to be a native born citizen of the United States, of which fact he had every sufficient document, together with free papers. Roberts entered on board the Sarah Ann in Baltimore, where he is married.

Sonty Taylor, boy, says he was born in Hackensack, New Jersey, but has neither friends, relations, nor acquaintance there; says Jane Snowden, of Savannah, Georgia, is his mother; never had a protection. Taylor is fifteen years old, has brown hair and light complexion; he entered on board the Sarah Ann in Savannah.

RICHARD MOON,

Late Commander of the Privateer Sarah Ann.

Copy of a letter from Admiral Warren to Mr. Mitchell, agent for the exchange of American prisoners of war, dated HALIFAX, October 21, 1812.

SIR:

I had the honor to receive your letter and its enclosures, relating to Thomas Dunn,* and beg leave to inform you, that it appears the said man is married in England, has been eight years in His Majesty's service, and received a pension from Government; under these circumstances, and the man never having made any application for his discharge from prison, he continues on board the Statira.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

* NOTE.—The application was made at the request of his father, John Dunn, of Boston, who transmitted a deposition of his birth.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, late Agent for American Seamen and Commerce at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State, dated

WASHINGTON, December 1, 1812.

"I take the liberty to enclose you copies of a correspondence which took place between Vice Admiral Stirling (commanding on the Jamaica station) and myself, since the declaration of war. I should have furnished it you at an earlier period, but an accident prevented, which I was not aware of until my arrival at this city."

Copy of my letter to Vice Admiral Stirling, commanding on the Jamaica station, on the subject of American seamen, after the declaration of war.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, August 6, 1812.

SIR: Enclosed is a copy of a letter received by me yesterday, from on board His Majesty's ship Sappho, purporting to have been written by four American seamen on board that ship, with a view to solicit my aid towards effecting their discharge, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Government of the United States, against Great Britain.

In making this application, I am fully aware that my duties ceased, as agent for the commerce and seamen of the United States, on the knowledge of such declaration being made known here; but, sir, I am led to believe that, at this period, it will not be deemed inadmissible on your part to receive, nor improper on mine to make, the request, that you will be pleased to grant an order for the discharge of these seamen, feeling conscious (should they even not be protected with the usual documents afforded to citizens of the United States) that an English seaman would not declare himself otherwise than such, under existing circumstances.

I seize the present opportunity also to forward to you twenty-one documents, as proof of the citizenship of that number of seamen, said to have been impressed by ships of war on this station, the greatest number of which have been heretofore unsuccessfully claimed by me, on behalf of the United States, and which may still comprise, at this time, some part of the crews of His Majesty's ships on this station.

I beg further to state to you, that I have received numerous applications from on board various of His Majesty's ships on this station, for the relief of seamen, who, I doubt not, are entitled to the protection of the American Government, many of them having with them proofs of their citizenship, as I am led to believe from the assertions contained in their communications. Applications have also been made for the relief of many, without success; the latter amount in number to forty-six, as per list of names enclosed, several of whom, I understand have been shifted (since their impressment) on board of other vessels than those they were at first taken on board of. All of which I beg to offer for your consideration, feeling, as I do, anxious to extend my last efforts in behalf of those seamen who are entitled to them, and at the same time being impressed with the idea, that it would be foreign to you, sir, to retain any Americans in the service of the navy of Great Britain, contrary to their disposition, during the present conflict. I, therefore, take the liberty of adding to my former request, that you will be pleased to grant orders that such seamen may be discharged from duty on board His Majesty's ships on this station.

With sentiments of the highest respect, &c.

WILLIAM H. SAVAGE.

Copy of Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary's letter, in answer to mine to the Vice Admiral of 6th August, 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, August 7, 1812.

SIR: I am desired by Vice Admiral Stirling to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to acquaint you that directions were given, some days ago, that all seamen in the squadron under his command, who can prove themselves to be American born subjects, should be sent to the prison ship, until an exchange of prisoners is established between the two countries, in consequence of the late declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain.

I return herewith the papers which accompanied your letter

And am, sir, &c.

CHAS. STIRLING, Jr. Secretary.

Extract of a letter from William H. Savage, Esq. late Agent for American Seamen and Commerce at Jamaica, to Charles Stirling, Jr. dated KINGSTON, September 16, 1812.

"In answer to my letter of the 6th ultimo, you were pleased to inform me that directions had been given by the Vice Admiral, some days prior to the date of my letter, for the removal of all native Americans (who could prove themselves such) from on board His Majesty's ships to that of the prison ship; but, as some time has now elapsed since you were pleased to give me this information, and learning that some instances of detention at present exist on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, I am led to embrace the subject again, as in one instance I shall hope to satisfy Vice Admiral Stirling of the man's being entitled to his removal from duty on board His Majesty's schooner of war. The person alluded to is Elijah Stirling, an American seaman, who was impressed from on board the British merchant ship Brilliant, at the Bay of Honduras, in the early part of the year 1810, by His Majesty's schooner Flordel Mar, and has since been detained on board of various of His Majesty's ships on this station, although provided with a regular protection, which instrument this man got conveyed to me about the 20th of September following, and which was by me forwarded to Admiral Rowley, accompanied (as usual in like cases) with a request that the man might be discharged. On the receipt of my letter, the Admiral answered, through his Secretary, that the nature of Stirling's impressment was such, that he could not comply with my request; but which answer was unaccompanied, in return, with the protection in question, and what has become of it, I am unable to say.

"About this period, I was led to understand from Admiral Rowley, that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board any British merchant vessel, would be retained in the service of His Majesty; but that all American seamen who should be impressed from on board of American vessels, would, on application, accompanied by proof, be discharged. As this information was received about the period of my application for the discharge of Stirling, I was led to conclude it stamped the nature of his impressment, and what confirmed it in my mind, was, that I received similar assurances to various applications made for American seamen, who had, under various circumstances, shipped on board of British ships, and were from thence impressed on board of His Majesty's ships of war, all of which I hope the Admiral will be pleased to take into consideration: for, to insist on the service of this man, I think will be a dereliction to the marked manner of his amiable endeavors to distinguish and relieve American seamen from duty on board the squadron under his command. I beg to enclose a note from Mr. Meek, (the late Secretary) relative to my application for this man's discharge, and to observe, that, if it is possible, the protection may yet be found among the papers of the late secretary, as it has not been usual to return me the protections of those men whose applications for discharge were not complied with.

"I beg furthermore to observe, that there appears also to be on board His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, two other American seamen, viz. John Englefield and Richard Lauderkin, the former of whom asserts, that he served his apprenticeship to the trade of a cooper, at Boston, but has lost his protection; the latter declares himself to be a native of Rhode Island, and that his protection has been destroyed by Mr. Oliver, commander of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte. I shall not now animadvert on the impropriety of such a circumstance, but request, should the instances here cited be found correct, that they may meet the attention of the Vice Admiral.

Extract of a letter from Vice Admiral Stirling's Secretary to W. H. Savage, Esq. in answer to his of the 16th September, 1812.

ADMIRAL'S PENN, 19th September, 1812.

"I have just received your letter of the 16th instant, which I have laid before Vice Admiral Stirling, and I am directed to acquaint you, that Elijah Stirling, and other persons on board of His Majesty's schooner Decouverte, said to be American seamen, have not, when called upon, produced proof of being subjects of the United States. They do not fall under the description of persons which I informed you, in my letter of the 7th ult., were intended to be discharged from the King's service, and to be detained on board the prison ship until an exchange of prisoners takes place with America.

"The note from Mr. Meek, dated the 21st September, 1810, is returned herewith, and as it appears thereby that Admiral Rowley thought the circumstances under which Elijah Stirling was impressed did not permit him to be discharged, Vice Admiral Stirling does not feel himself justified in attending to the man's wishes on a bare assertion. The protection you allude to is not to be found among Admiral Rowley's papers left in this office."

No. 3.

Detention of Mariners as prisoners of war, who were in England at the time the war was declared.

J. W. Croker to Mr. Beasley.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, 5th August, 1812.

SIR:

Having communicated to my lords commissioners of the admiralty your letter of the 31st ultimo, transmitting a list of men, said to be Americans, who have been impressed and detained on board His Majesty's ships, and requesting their discharge, I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you, that, under present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of this request.

I am, &c.

J. W. CROKER.

R. G. BEASLEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Beasley to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, October 23, 1812.

"I have informed you that I had addressed Lord Castlereagh on the subject of our citizens who have been impressed, and are now held in the British naval service. I demanded their release, and complained of the treatment which some had received on offering to give themselves up as prisoners, or refusing to serve when they heard of the war. In reply, I have received a short note from Mr. Cooke, one of the under secretaries, stating that he was instructed to require of me the names of the men who had received the treatment complained of, and the vessels in which they were, which I immediately furnished, and urged a reply to the other part of my letter. In an interview I have since had with Mr. Cooke, I took occasion to remind him of it, when he intimated that the Government did not intend to answer me on that point; adding, that England was fighting the battles of the world; we had chosen to go to war, and so aid the great enemy, and that England had as much right to recruit her army and navy, in every possible manner, as France."

Mr. Beasley to Lord Castlereagh.

WIMPOLE STREET, October 12, 1812.

MY LORD:

In consequence of the war unhappily existing between the United States and Great Britain, it has become my duty to call your lordship's attention to the situation of the great number of American seamen who have been impressed, and are now held in the ships of war of His Britannic Majesty. In addition to the wrong which is done to the United States by this detention of their seamen, I regret to state that some of these unfortunate persons, having heard of the war, and offered to give themselves up as prisoners, have, for so doing, or for refusing to do service, been punished.

To put an end to a proceeding and a state of things so revolting to humanity, and so contrary to the law and usage of civilized nations, I persuade myself it is only necessary to present them to the view of the British Government; and I therefore trust that effectual measures will be immediately taken to restore these injured men to liberty and to their country.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

E. Cooke to R. G. Beasley.

FOREIGN OFFICE, 19th October, 1812.

"In consequence of your letter to Lord Castlereagh of the 12th instant, I am directed by his lordship to desire you will furnish me with the names of the American sailors who have been so punished, and of the ship they are on board."

Mr. Beasley to E. Cooke.

WIMPOLE STREET, 21st October, 1812.

SIR:

Agreeably to the request contained in your letter of the 19th instant, I now transmit to you a list of impressed American seamen on board British ships of war, who, having heard of the war, offered to give themselves up as prisoners, and for so doing, or for refusing to do service, have been punished.

I beg you to remind Lord Castlereagh, that the other part of my letter of the 12th instant, requesting the release of the American seamen detained in the British service, is still unanswered.

I am, sir, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

The list referred to in the preceding letter, states the cases of the following persons:

John Bailard, on board the Zenobia, offered himself a prisoner, refused, and was put in irons for one night.

John Davis, on board the Thistle, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service, for which he was flogged.

Ephraim Covell, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service, in consequence of which he was kept seven days in irons.

John Hosman, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, and refused further service; was put in irons, still kept therein, and was threatened by the commander with further punishment.

Russell Brainard, on board La Hogue, gave himself up as a prisoner, and still kept therein.

Thomas W. Marshall, Peter Lazette, Edward Whittle Banks, and Levi Younger, on board the Royal William, gave themselves up as prisoners, and were in consequence thereof put into close confinement for eight days.

Mr. Beasley requests Lord Castlereagh to cause the necessary passports to be furnished for the American ship William and Eliza, Captain Howland, to proceed to the United States with American citizens.

October 21, 1812.

Mr. Cooke acquaints Mr. Beasley that there will be no objection to granting a licence to a cartel for carrying to the United States such American citizens, non-combatants, as may wish to return to their country. He requests Mr. Beasley to inform him of the situation of the American ship William and Eliza.

Mr. Beasley to E. Cooke.

WIMPOLE STREET, October 23, 1812.

SIR:

I have now the honor to repeat to you what I stated in conversation this morning, that the persons for whose return to the United States I requested the necessary passports, are, for the most part, American masters and mariners; that some of them, in consequence of the loss of their vessels abroad, have come here on their way to America; that others of them, having been employed in British ships, are now desirous of returning home; that others, through the detention or condemnation of their vessels under British orders in council, and others, through all the casualties to which this class of men is always exposed, are left without the means of conveyance. None of these persons have been, in any way, engaged in hostilities against Great Britain. They are almost wholly destitute, and, for some time, have been chiefly supported at the expense of the United States. There are also, I believe, some American merchants and supercargoes, who are anxious of availing themselves of the same opportunity of returning to their country.

You are, I presume, aware, that the American Government has afforded every facility to the departure of those British subjects in the United States who were under similar circumstances with the persons included in my request.

With regard to the ship William and Eliza, in which these persons are to embark, I beg to observe, that I am well assured by those who have charge of her, that there is no impediment to her departure.

I am, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

E. Cooke to R. G. Beasley.

FOREIGN OFFICE, October 28, 1812.

SIR:

Having laid before Lord Castlereagh your letter requesting that you may be allowed to send a cartel to America, with citizens of the United States who wish to return to their country, I am directed by his lordship to express his consent to this proposition, and am to desire you will confer with the commissioners for prisoners of war with regard to the account you are to give for such parts of the crew as shall appear to be combatants, and on that principle must be exchanged.

I am, &c.

E. COOKE.

OCTOBER 29, 1812.

Mr. Beasley states to J. W. Croker, of the admiralty office, that Lord Castlereagh had referred him to the commissioners for prisoners of war; that he had accordingly applied to them, and learnt that the instructions which that board had received from the lords of the admiralty were not sufficiently explicit to enable them to proceed in the matter. Mr. Beasley requests that their lordships would be pleased to give such further directions to the transport board as might be found necessary.

OCTOBER 30, 1812.

John Barrow, of the admiralty office, informs Mr. Beasley, that his letter of the 29th October had been laid before the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and that the business had been referred to the transport board.

OCTOBER 29, 1812.

Mr. Beasley informs Alexander M^rLeay, of the transport office, that he had requested the lords of the admiralty would be pleased to give the further instructions necessary, and presuming that these instructions would be immediately given, requests Mr. M^rLeay to inform him at what time it will be convenient for the commissioners that he should confer with them on the subject.

OCTOBER 30, 1812.

Alexander M^rLeay informs Mr. Beasley that he is directed to desire that Mr. B. would transmit to the transport office a list of all the persons whom Mr. Beasley proposed to send to America, stating their several qualities, and when, and how, they respectively came into Great Britain.

NOVEMBER 3, 1812.

Mr. Beasley transmits to Alexander M'Leay, of the transport office, a list of American citizens whom it is proposed to send to the United States in the ship William and Eliza, stating their several qualities, and when, and how; they respectively came into Great Britain. This list contains one hundred and ten names. To these are added a list of six persons, being other passengers in the same vessel. Mr. Beasley remarks to Mr. M'Leay, "I am well informed that many persons of the description, and under the circumstances, of those mentioned in the first of these lists, (being seamen) who were awaiting the result of my late application to Lord Castlereagh for a cartel for their conveyance to America, have, within a few days past, been seized by the impress officers, and taken on board the tender of the Tower; and I beg to know what are the intentions of the British Government respecting them."

NOVEMBER 6, 1812.

Alexander M'Leay informs Mr. Beasley that he had received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, the list of persons proposed to be sent to the United States in the William and Eliza cartel, and adds, "In return I am directed to request that you will inform the board whether you will engage, that the above mentioned persons, on their arrival in the United States, shall be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects, who may have fallen into the hands of the Americans. I am at the same time to acquaint you, that the prisoners above alluded to must sign engagements not to serve against this country or its allies until regularly exchanged."

Mr. Beasley writes to Alexander M'Leay.

NOVEMBER 7, 1812.

"I have to inform the board that I am willing to engage that the American citizens whom I propose to send to the United States on board the William and Eliza cartel, shall, on their arrival there, be exchanged for an equivalent number of British subjects of the same description, who may have fallen into the hands of the United States under similar circumstances; and that the men themselves shall sign engagements for the performance of any conditions similar to those which may have been exacted of such British subjects in the United States; it being understood, that, if it be found that British subjects, under any such circumstances, have been suffered freely to depart from the United States, then these engagements, so far as regards the corresponding class of American citizens, shall be void. If, however, it be more satisfactory to the board, that the return or exchange of these men should be regulated by the principles recognised by the two Governments in the cartel which, I am informed, has been lately concluded at Washington, I am ready to enter into an engagement to that effect."

Alexander M'Leay writes to Mr. Beasley.

NOVEMBER 13, 1812.

"I am directed to acquaint you that the prisoners mentioned in the list transmitted by you will be released, upon your entering into an unconditional engagement that they shall be exchanged for British prisoners now in America, or who may be hereafter taken."

Mr. Beasley writes to Alexander M'Leay.

NOVEMBER 16, 1812.

"For those American citizens who composed the crews of ships taken in war, I am at all times ready to enter into any engagement which the law and usage of nations require. But for those whom your laws have invited, or whom misfortune has thrown into your country, whom accident, and not the fortune of war, has placed within your power, I must still urge my request, that they be allowed to depart the kingdom on the conditions proposed in my letter of the 7th instant." But "if the board will enter into an unconditional engagement, that all British subjects who have been permitted to leave the United States since the declaration of war, or who may be permitted to depart therefrom, shall be exchanged for American prisoners of war, I will, in like manner, engage for those American citizens agreeably to your letter." Mr. Beasley adds, "This arrangement, however, I would make with great reluctance; because it would not be in unison with that spirit of liberal warfare entertained by the Government of the United States, and because it would bring within the influence of the war those who might, without detriment to either party, be exempt from its operation."

Mr. Beasley writes to Mr. Hamilton, of the Foreign Office.

NOVEMBER 23, 1812.

"I must beg leave to state, that that part of my note of the 12th ultimo, addressed to Lord Castlereagh, relative to American citizens who have been impressed, and are now held in his majesty's naval service, remains unanswered. To the reasons already urged for the discharge of those men, may be added that of compelling them to fight against their country; and I need scarcely add, that, as they were forcibly detained before the commencement of hostilities, it would be very unjust to discharge them merely to make them prisoners. Of the number of those unfortunate persons, many must be in vessels on foreign stations at a great distance. It is a subject of much public interest in the United States, and one which involves the domestic comfort and happiness of many families."

Alexander M'Leay writes to Mr. Beasley, and, after some preliminary reasoning, says:

NOVEMBER 24, 1812.

"The commissioners (of the transport office) are instructed (by the lords commissioners of the admiralty) to continue to require from you an unconditional receipt, as prisoners of war, for all persons of this description previous to their being permitted to return to America."

Alexander M'Leay writes to Mr. Beasley.

DECEMBER 23, 1812.

"I have received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, &c. your letter of the 15th instant, and in return am directed to acquaint you that, at present, they are only authorized to deliver up to you the Americans mentioned in the list transmitted by you on the 3d of November."

Mr. Beasley writes to Alexander M'Leay.

DECEMBER 21, 1812.

"After so long a time spent in discussing the principles and conditions of an exchange of prisoners between the United States and Great Britain, I perceive, with some surprise, by your letter of yesterday, that the only persons whom the board are authorized to deliver up to me, are those mentioned in the list transmitted to you on the 3d November, who, though so long known to the board as being at large in this city, have never been detained as prisoners, and who have, ever since their arrival, been maintained at the charge of the United States. During this interval those persons have been partially dispersed; some have been taken up as prisoners, some have been impressed, and some have otherwise disappeared. Others, however, under similar circumstances, have since been added, and there now remain about one hundred persons. Of these men, as I understand the tenor of our correspondence, those who belonged to vessels detained or taken in war, are to be suffered to proceed to the United States on my entering into the engagement which accompanied your letter of the 14th instant; but that, for the others, no engagement is required. In order to avoid any further misunderstanding, I beg to know whether this recapitulation is correct."

Alexander M'Leay to R. G. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, 26th December, 1812.

SIR:

I have received and laid before the commissioners for the transport service, &c. your letter of the 24th instant, and, in return, I am directed to acquaint you that it is the intention of his Majesty's Government that such of the Americans, named in the list which accompanied your letter of the 3d of last month, as belonged to vessels detained or taken, and as are consequently prisoners of war, shall be suffered to proceed to the United States upon your entering into the engagement which accompanied my letter of the 14th instant; but that, for Americans who were resident or travelling in this country, or resorting hither for commercial purposes, not as mariners, no such engagement will be required.

I am, &c.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

Mr. Beasley writes to Alexander M'Leay.

DECEMBER 28, 1812.

"On referring to that list (which accompanied my letter of the 3d ultimo) you will perceive another class of persons, namely, mariners, who did not belong to vessels detained or taken; and as your omitting to notice these men in your letter might leave room for some doubt respecting them, I lose no time in requesting to be informed on what terms the board understand that they are to be suffered to return to the United States."

Alexander M'Leay writes to Mr. Beasley.

DECEMBER 29, 1812.

"By a reference to my letter of the 26th instant, you will observe that mariners are expressly excepted from the description of persons who are to be released unconditionally, and consequently it is necessary you should give a receipt for all the mariners named in the list transmitted by you."

Mr. Beasley to Alexander M'Leay.

FEBRUARY 17, 1813.

"In your reply of the 9th instant, communicating the result of inquiries made by order of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen claiming to be Americans, in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war, as represented in my letter to Lord Castlereagh of the 12th October, I have to observe, that, although the statement of those persons, and that contained in your letter, differ greatly as to the degree of this ill treatment, it does appear that some severity was exercised towards them on that occasion, and without any proper investigation of their claim of American citizenship, which, if established, should have exempted them not only from punishment, but from service. As it may be inferred, however, from your letter, that if proof be produced to support their claim, their request will yet be complied with, I have to inform you, that evidence to that effect was long since transmitted to the lords of the admiralty in behalf of several of these persons." [Here follows the names of persons, and a recitation of the proof of citizenship, &c.] Mr. Beasley proceeds, "I cannot avoid expressing my disappointment and regret that no notice has been taken of the request made to Lord Castlereagh in my letter of the 12th of October, for the general release of the American seamen detained in the British service."

Alexander M'Leay to R. G. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, February 26, 1813.

SIR:

I have received, and laid before the Commissioners for the Transport Service, &c. your letter of the 17th of this month, with its enclosure, relative to the alleged ill treatment of certain seamen, claiming to be Americans, in the British service, in consequence of their having requested to be considered as prisoners of war; and the same having been referred to the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, I am directed by the Board to transmit to you the enclosed copy of a letter which they have received from their Lordship's Secretary, in answer thereto.

I am, &c.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY

John Barrow to the Transport Board.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, February 25, 1813.

GENTLEMEN:

Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, your letter of the 18th instant, enclosing a copy of a letter, together with the documents therein referred to, from Mr. Beasley, the American agent for prisoners of war in this country, on the subject of certain alleged citizens of the United States detained in his Majesty's service, I have it in command to signify their Lordships' directions to you to acquaint Mr. Beasley, that neither now, in war, nor before, during peace, is, or was, the British Government desirous of having American seamen in its service; and that their Lordships will now discharge, as prisoners of war, as they formerly did as neutrals, those persons who can adduce any sufficient proof of their being Americans.

You will further inform Mr. Beasley, that all the cases stated by him have received, or are under accurate examination, and that such persons who may appear to be Americans, will be immediately sent to prison, as many have been already.

I am, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

Alexander M'Leay to Mr. Beasley.

TRANSPORT OFFICE, March 6, 1813.

SIR:

I am directed by the Commissioners for the Transport Service, &c. to inform you, that, upon the receipt of the printed letters which were transmitted by you to this office, for the purpose of being forwarded to certain seamen on board of his Majesty's ships of war, they considered it their duty to submit the same to the consideration of the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and to request their Lordships' directions on the subject; and the Board having, this day, received a letter from their Lordships' secretary, of which the enclosed is a copy, I have their directions to acquaint you accordingly, that the letters in question will not be forwarded, and that you cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board his Majesty's fleet.

I am, &c.

ALEXANDER M'LEAY.

John Barrow to the Transport Board.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, March 5, 1813.

GENTLEMEN:

In reply to your letter of the 16th of last month, enclosing a letter addressed by Mr. Beasley to a seaman on board his Majesty's ship Porcupine, and requesting to be informed if letters of a similar description should be forwarded to the persons to whom they are addressed, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioner of the Admiralty, to signify their direction to you not to forward any such letters, and to acquaint Mr. Beasley that he cannot be permitted to maintain any correspondence with the seamen on board his Majesty's fleets observing to him, at the same time, that the printed letter, in question, contains a statement unfounded in fact, for that, neither since the war with America, nor before, have their Lordships declined to release American seamen, admitted or proved to be such, though they have, and still do refuse, to release persons assuming, without any proof or document, that character.

I am, &c.

JOHN BARROW.

Copy of a printed circular letter addressed to American seamen in British ships of war.

LONDON, —, 1813.

In answer to your letter of the — —, I have to inform you, that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty having, in consequence of the war between the United States and Great Britain, declined to release those American citizens who have been impressed, and are held in the British service, there appears to be no other course for you to pursue, than to give yourself up as a prisoner of war, to the commander of the ship in which you are detained.

Agent of the United States for prisoners of war in Great Britain.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Beasley to Alexander M'Leay, dated 13th March, 1813.

"In the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 5th inst. the Board are directed to observe to me, that the printed letter which I addressed to certain American seamen detained in the British navy, "contains a statement unfounded in fact; for that, neither since the war with America, nor before, have their Lordships declined to release American seamen, admitted, or proved to be such." It is not necessary to my present purpose to enter upon an examination of their Lordships' conduct, on this matter, before the war; although my own official observation, in numerous cases, when I held the office of consul, would authorize me to dispute even that part of their secretary's assertion. But with reference to their Lordships' conduct since the war, I beg to remind them of their letter of the fifth August, soon after the commencement of the war, in answer to a request made on the 31st July, for the release of certain impressed American seamen, in which their Lordships, going beyond the mere declining to release the men, stated "that, under the present circumstances, they will defer the consideration of the request for their release;" or, in other words, that they will not, at present, war being commenced, even think on the subject of their release. If further proof be necessary of their Lordships' having, as I stated in my printed letter, declined the release of such seamen in consequence of the war, I will call to their recollection a letter written by their secretary, on the 25th of August, in answer to an application for the release of William Wilson, an impressed American, detained on board the Cordelia, in which they state that this man, being an alien enemy, must continue to serve, or go to prison. Should other corroboration be wanted, it may be found in the long and marked silence of the British Government to my numerous applications, again and again repeated, for the release of these men; seeing that it was not until the 25th of February, nearly seven months after their Lordships had informed me of their having deferred the consideration of the subject, and nearly five months after my formal demand made to Lord Castlereagh, that they directed the Board to inform me of their intention to treat them as prisoners of war. And even this was not done until eight days after my printed letter in question appears to have been on their table. Surely it was in utter forgetfulness of all these circumstances, that their Lordships declared my statement unfounded in fact; for it appears impossible that they can, in the mind of any person, bear a different interpretation from that which I have given them. But how do these facts bear on their Lordships' statement? How, I ask, does their determination, that Wilson, proved and admitted to be an American, must continue to serve or go to prison, support the assertion, that their Lordships have not declined to release American seamen when admitted or proved to be such? But, perhaps, in their Lordships' view, to send them from service and detention in ships of war, to confinement in prisons, is to release them. If so, it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, and I will content myself with having vindicated the correctness of my own statement."

"I come now to the consideration of their Lordships' purpose, as expressed in their Secretary's letter of the 25th ultimo, to treat as prisoners of war the American seamen who have been impressed, and are held in the British service. Taking into view the manner in which these unfortunate persons came into the power of the British Government; that their own rights and inclinations, the rights of their country, the law of nations, and every principle of justice were violated in the very act by which each of these men was brought within its power, and that this wrong accumulates so long as any of them remain in its power, I do maintain that they are, on every ground, entitled to, and the British Government is bound to grant, their immediate and complete release. It acquired them only as the spoils of unlawful violence; how then can it retain them as the fruits of lawful war? Its right of control over them can only arise from the lawfulness of their detention; but that which was unlawfully taken cannot be rightfully held; and to acknowledge the pretension to such control as their Lordships' purpose implies, would be to legitimatise the act by which they came into their power. The British Government disclaims all right and all intention to take them, and this disavowal is an acknowledgment of its obligation to restore them to the same condition, and to the same freedom, from which they were taken. Upon what ground is it, then, that they are to be treated as prisoners of war? Not many years have elapsed since all Europe resounded with the complaints of Great Britain against France, for retaining, as prisoners of war, certain British subjects, who, having entered the French territories, in time of peace, were found there at the breaking out of the war. But, if that were regarded in England as an outrage, what will be thought of this detention, as prisoners of war, of American seamen, who, having been wrongfully taken on the high seas, and forcibly carried into the British service, in time of peace, are found therein at the breaking out of a war, doing her service, and fighting her battles? The conduct of France was attempted to be justified by certain acts of England, which were alleged to be equally contrary to the law of nations. But what justification, what excuse, can be set up for this conduct of Great Britain towards the impressed American seamen? What infraction of the law of nations, what violence or injustice exercised towards British subjects, or what outrage is this cruel act to retaliate? It cannot be the free and spontaneous permission given by the United States, at the commencement of the war, for every British subject, of every class and description, found within their territories, or in their power, to return to his country, that this imprisonment of American seamen is to require. And, surely, this cannot be the indemnification which Great Britain offers these unfortunate men for the wrongs which she has inflicted on them, or the reward which she bestows for the service she has received at their hands.

"To the unqualified prohibition of all correspondence between myself and the impressed American seamen in his Britannic Majesty's fleet, so unreservedly stated in the letter of their Lordships' secretary of the 6th instant, I must conform, whatever may be my sentiments and feelings respecting it. The situation in which these unfortunate men and myself stood towards each other, appeared not only to invite, but to authorize a communication between us. On their part, the object of this correspondence was to obtain information and counsel as to the proper manner of conducting themselves under circumstances the most difficult, and on an occasion the most important and solemn, namely, how to act while forcibly held to service in ships of war belonging to a State engaged in actual hostilities against their country—a situation which their own good sense and proper feelings taught them was alike incompatible with their rights and their duties. My part has been, after having waited five months, in vain, for a communication of their Lordships' intentions, to recommend them, since there appeared no means of obtaining their release, to give themselves up as prisoners of war—an evil comparatively light to that which they suffer. In other instances, their letters have related the rejection of their offer, and the threats of punishment, and all contain complaints of the unexampled hardship of their situation."

Extract of a letter from Robert Montgomery, Consul of the United States at Alicante, dated the 4th November, 1812, to the Secretary of State.

"Herewith is a copy of a letter to Admiral Hallowell, with his reply. The man in question has declared, under oath, that he never signed any article or agreement whatever to serve on board the Indefatigable, nor any other British vessel, and he has now left her, losing what wages was due him."

ALICANTE, 23d October, 1812.

SIR: Philips, a mariner and citizen of the United States, as appears by a regular protection, from the collector of New York, informs me that, some time since, he engaged himself on board the transport Indefatigable, for six months, at certain wages agreed for; that he has now been eight months in said vessel, and demands his discharge and wages, but the master having refused both, obliges me to request you will inform yourself of the fact, and if as the mariner states, order him to be paid off and discharged.

Permit me to assure you, &c.

ROBT. MONTGOMERY.

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL, Esq. Admiral Royal Navy of Great Britain.

Admiral Hallowell to Mr. Montgomery.

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP MALTA, in Alicante Bay,

October 26, 1812.

SIR: I find upon inquiry that there is on board the Indefatigable transport, the man mentioned in your letter of the 23d. As there is no objection to a foreigner going in the station of mariner, on board a vessel of that description, and as he has signed articles of agreement to serve on board the Indefatigable, I shall not molest him while he continues in her: but the moment he gets his discharge, I shall deem it my duty to take hold of him, and put him in confinement, as a prisoner of war.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Compulsory service of impressed Americans on board British ships of war.

I, Beekman Verplanck Hoffman, of the town of Poughkeepsie, do certify, that I am a lieutenant in the United States' Navy; that I was a lieutenant on board the Constitution frigate in the action and capture of the Guerriere; that, after her surrender, I was sent on board; and after taking out the crew, fired and blew up the ship; that eight impressed American seamen were among the crew of the Guerriere, who were liberated at Boston. I was also on board the Constitution, in the action and capture of the Java, and was sent on board that vessel, and after the crew were removed, set her on fire and blew her up. Amongst the crew of the Java, thirteen impressed American seamen were found, three of whom had entered the British service, and were left, the other ten were liberated as Americans.

POUGHKEEPSIE, April 16, 1813.

DUTCHESS COUNTY, 89.

Richard Thompson, being sworn, saith, that he is a native of New Paltz, opposite Poughkeepsie; that he sailed from Wilmington, about the 28th of April, 1810, on board the brig Warren, William Kelly, captain, for Cork. On the homeward passage, in September following, he was impressed and taken on board the Peacock, a British sloop of war, and compelled to do duty. That, while on board that vessel, he made many unsuccessful attempts to write to his friends, to inform them of his situation. He further saith, that, after he had heard of the war, himself and two other impressed American seamen, who were on board the Peacock, went aft to the captain, and claimed to be considered as American prisoners of war, and refused to do duty any longer. They were ordered off the quarter deck, and the captain called for the master-at-arms, and ordered us to be put in irons; we were then kept in irons about twenty-four hours, when we were taken out, brought to the gangway, stripped of our clothes, tied and whipped, each one dozen and a half lashes, and put to duty.

He further saith, that he was kept on board the Peacock, and did duty, till the action with the Hornet; after the Hornet hoisted American colors, he, and the other impressed Americans, again went to the Captain of the Peacock, asked to be sent below, said it was an American ship, and that they did not wish to fight against their country. The Captain ordered us to our quarters; called midshipman Stone to do his duty; and if we did not do our duty, to blow our brains out. "Ay, ay!" was answered by Stone, who then held a pistol at my head, and ordered us to our places. We then continued at our pieces, and were compelled to fight till the Peacock struck: and we were liberated after an imprisonment of about two years and eight months.

James Tompkins, being sworn, saith, that he is a native of Ulster county, opposite Poughkeepsie; that he sailed out of New York, in the month of April, 1812, in the Ship Minerva, bound to Ireland; that, on her homeward bound passage, in July after, this deponent, with three other American seamen, Samuel Davis, William Young, and John Brown, were impressed and taken on board the British ship Acteon, David Smith, Captain. We were taken on Saturday evening; on Monday morning we were brought to the gangway, and informed that we must enter on board the ship and live as other seamen, or we should live on oatmeal and water and receive five dozen lashes. This deponent says, himself and the other three impressed with him, did refuse to enter, and each of them were then whipped five dozen lashes. On Wednesday following, we were again all brought up and had the same offer made to us, to enter, which we refused, and we were again whipped four dozen lashes, each. On Saturday after, the like offer was made to us, and on our refusal we were again whipped three dozen lashes. On Monday following, still refusing to enter, we were again whipped two dozen, each. On Wednesday following, we were again whipped one dozen each, and ordered to be taken below, and put in irons till we did enter; and the Captain said he would punish the damned Yankee rascals till they did enter. We were then put in irons, and laid in irons three months. During the time of our impressment the ship had an action, and captured a French ship. Before this action we were taken out of irons and asked to fight, but we refused; and after the action we were again ironed, where we remained till the ship arrived at Loudon. After arriving there we first heard of the war with America, and that the Guerriere was taken. This deponent took his shirt, and Samuel Davis and William Young took their handkerchiefs, made stripes and stars for the American colors, and hung it over a gun, and gave three cheers for the victory. The next morning at six o'clock we were brought up and whipped, two dozen lashes each, for huzzinga for the Yankee flag. Shortly after this, we were all released by the assistance of the American Consul and Captain Hall, who knew us.

This deponent further saith, that all had protections, and showed them, and claimed to be Americans, at the time they were impressed.

JAMES TOMPKINS.

Sworn before me this 17th day of April, 1813; at which time the said James Tompkins showed me his wrists, which, at his request, I examined, and there appeared to be marks on both of them, occasioned, as I suppose, from his having been in irons.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

MONTREAL PRISON, May 9, 1813.

SIR:

Yesterday Sir George's aid came and informed me that the nature of my confinement had been contrary to his orders, and Colonel Lethbridge was required to restore me my liberty. I was also informed, that you and myself would probably, in a few days, be sent to the United States. Colonel Lethbridge told me he would send for me at 3 o'clock, and take my parole. In less than one hour, Major Shackleton called, and said the Governor, after a more mature consideration, had concluded he could not let me have my liberty until he would hear from General Proctor.

Two or three days after my imprisonment, Major Shackleton told me that General Proctor had promised, with the next despatches, to send on all the papers relating to my case, and that then I would have a hearing.

So you may see punishment by torture is not yet abolished. If they had drove a dagger through my heart, my punishment would have been much less, and their compassion much greater.

Yours, &c.

SAMUEL M'KEEHAN.

Major Shackleton also told me that Colonel Baynes was unauthorized to tell me what he did.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

S. M'K.

MONTREAL GAOL, May 12, 1813.

SIR: I am requested by Doctor M'Keehan to inform you of his present unpleasant situation. He is at this time so unwell as to be confined to his bed, and has no chance of getting any thing to make him comfortable. No person attends here to examine our situation; neither have we a chance to send out after any necessities that we want.

I am confident the doctor's case requires some very speedy aid, particularly as it respects his confined situation, lodging, &c.

Yours, respectfully,

GEO. H. RODGERS, United States' Army.

Lieutenant DUDLEY.

DOCTOR M'KEEHAN'S NARATIVE.

On the 31st January last I was ordered, by General Harrison, to proceed to the river Raisin, with a flag of truce, and from thence to Malden, if not stopped by the Indians. We arrived at the foot of the rapids of the Miami, at dark, and not finding a company of rangers as expected, we encamped in a cave, the horse and carryall before the door, and the flag standing by them. About midnight the Indians fired in upon us, killed Mr. Lemont, wounded myself in the foot, and made us prisoners. After despatching Mr. Lemont with the tomahawk, scalping and stripping him, they seized my horse, harness, great coat, blankets, and other clothing, and one hundred dollars in gold, which the General had sent to procure necessities for the wounded of General Winchester's army.

That night I was made to walk more than twenty miles, to where Captain Elliot was stationed with a party of Indians. The captain treated me politely, and sent me to Colonel Proctor. I was scarcely seated before the Colonel began to exclaim against Gen. Harrison; said he had been used to fight Indians and not British; found fault with my instructions, and said the flag was only a pretext to cover a bad design. I rebutted his insinuations with indignation, which I believe has been the cause of all my troubles since. I was not recognized, in my official character, until the 5th of February, when I was informed by Proctor's aid that I should attend on the wounded with Doctor Bower, and that I would be sent to the United States, but by a different route from that which I came. Doctor Bower in a few days was sent home and I detained.

On the 2d of March, I was arrested, by order of Colonel Proctor, and accused of carrying on a private correspondence. On the 8th, without having any trial, ordered to Montreal, and hurried on from Fort George, night and day, although thinly clothed, and the weather very cold. From Kingston to Prescott, I was made to eat with the officers' servants. This course of torture being finished, on the 28th, when I arrived in Montreal, and without being asked any questions, or suffered to ask any myself, I was put into the dungeon, eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, where I had neither bed nor bedding, chair, bench, or stool; denied pen, ink, and paper, or even the use of a book, for two weeks. The only current of air that passed through my apartment came through the bowels of the privy! Here I was kept thirty-three days, when I was, to my great joy, put up with the American prisoners, and with them permitted to remain, till last Monday, when I was liberated by the intercession of Lieutenant Dudley, of the navy. Colonel Baynes, aid to the Governor, told me the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders.

I left fourteen American prisoners in gaol, viz: George H. Rodgers, United States' army; Wm. Hollenback, Onis Hooker, Philaster Jones, Harry Jones, Lewis Minor, Zebina Conkey, Phiney Conkey, Canton; Seth Barnes, Camden; Jared Witherill, John Campbell, Schoharie; Major Watson, Ogdensburg; Alexander M'Gregor, Balston, who were kept in close confinement, notwithstanding Colonel Lethbridge and Major Shackleton had pledged their words to Captain Conkey, before he left Montreal for Quebec, that they should have the liberty of the town during the day. But the Captain was scarcely gone, when the pledge was either forgotten or disregarded. The prisoners now are not permitted to procure such things as their small stock of money would provide. Sometimes they are half a day without water, and two or three days without wood; and if they complain they are cursed and abused by the gaoler, and told they are only allowed a quart of water in the day. I am requested to represent their situation to General Dearborn, which I intend to do as soon as I arrive at Sackett's Harbor.

This is a sketch of the indignities I have had to put up with since the last of January.

I am, yours, &c.

SAMUEL M'KEEHAN,
Surgeon's Mate 2d Reg't Ohio Militia.

ALBANY, May 24th, 1813.

To his Excellency Major General Dearborn.

SIR: Without introduction or apology, I beg leave to state to your Excellency, that, on the 31st of January last, I was ordered by General Harrison to proceed to the river Raisin with a flag of truce. I was required, in my instructions, if I met no British officer at that place, to proceed to Malden (it too great danger did not appear from the savages.) The same evening, thirty-three miles from the river Raisin, the Indians fired upon us and killed Mr. Lemont, (one of my attendants) wounded myself in the foot, then conveyed me to Captain Elliot, who took me to the river Raisin, and from thence sent me to General Proctor, at head quarters, in Sandwich, who swore, by God, that the flag and papers which I gave him, was only a pretence to cover a dishonorable service. I rebutted his insinuations as moderately as my indignant feelings would permit. General Proctor made several observations on General Harrison's abilities as a commander; said he was used to fight Indians, but not British troops, &c. &c. He kept my instructions; did not even inform the senior officer, Ensign Baker, of the American prisoners, that he had a letter for him. I was ordered to a tavern, under the care of a French sergeant. I waited till the 4th of February before I wrote to General Proctor, demanding in what character I was considered; how long I would be detained, and the cause of my detention.

The next day the General's aid informed me I was recognised as surgeon's mate, and would attend with Doctor Bower on the American wounded prisoners. On the 12th, I received a letter from General Proctor, in answer to one I had written to him the day before, of which the following is a copy:

SANDWICH, 12th February, 1813.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I am directed by Colonel Proctor, commanding, to observe, that you were sent in for the purpose of attending on the sick and wounded of General Winchester's army, for which purpose you are now detained; and beg leave further to observe, that, in the execution of your duty, you will render a most important service to your country.

I have the honor to be, sir, your humble and most obedient servant,

A. W. M'LEAN, A. D. C.

I continued to attend the wounded until the 2d of March, when A. D. C. M'Lean informed me that I was accused of carrying on a private correspondence, and that he was ordered to take me into custody and secure my papers; which was accordingly done in the most uncivil manner. On the 8th of March, I was taken by a guard to Fort George, without trial or hearing, although I had written to General Proctor repeatedly, requesting an investigation, to which I received no answer of any kind. From Fort George I was sent to Montreal, and hurried on night and day, although thinly clothed (having been robbed and stripped by the Indians) and the weather very cold. On my arrival at Montreal, I was, without being asked any questions, or permitted to ask any myself, put into a dungeon eight or ten feet below the surface of the ground, in dark and solitary confinement, and there kept thirty-three days, after which time I was put up with the American prisoners. A few days after my elevation, Lieutenant Dudley became acquainted with my situation, and made such representations to Governor Prevost as induced his Excellency to send his aid, Colonel Baynes, who said he was directed by the Governor to inform me that the outrage which had been committed on my person was contrary to his orders, and told Colonel Lethbridge to take my parole and liberate me immediately. The Colonel, not having materials for writing at hand, said he would send for me at three o'clock. In less than one hour, the town major came, and informed me that the Governor, on more mature consideration, thought he could not liberate me until he got despatches from General Proctor. On the 17th May, eight or ten days after, I was taken from prison, and, in company with Lieutenant Dudley, sent to the United States. I may here observe, that the apartment in which I was confined did not contain either chair, bench, or stool, or any bedding whatever, for the space of two weeks. Fresh beef was furnished, but no salt. I was denied pen, ink, and paper, and treated uniformly with the utmost contempt by the sergeant, whom I had the honor of seeing once every day for a few minutes. By the request of fourteen American prisoners, now in Montreal gaol, whose names are hereunto annexed, I beg leave to state to your Excellency, that they are kept in close confinement, sometimes half a day without water, and frequently two or three days without wood to cook with; and when they complained, the gaoler's curses were freely lavished upon them. They have not the privilege of procuring some little necessaries, which the benevolence of some humane persons enabled them to do by giving them a little money. Sir George Prevost has told them that their confinement is owing to the bad faith of their own Government, &c.

I would have stated to your Excellency the knowledge I had, through the report of others, of the outrages and cruelties exercised on the American prisoners taken at General Winchester's defeat, but must refer your Excellency to Mr. Ruland, who had a command in the Michigan militia last summer, and who was, after having been dispossessed of all his property, sent to Fort George with me, who, no doubt, had many opportunities of hearing such things triumphantly spoken of among British officers and subjects.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

SAMUEL M'KEEHAN,
Surgeon's Mate 2d Reg't Ohio Militia.

RANSOM OF AMERICAN PRISONERS FROM INDIANS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to the Secretary of State.

ALBANY, March 22, 1813.

A few days previous to the thirty-first of January, 1813, I transmitted some letters addressed to the friends and families of a few of the prisoners whom we had been able to ransom out of the hands of the savages.

"On the thirty-first of January I addressed you a letter covering similar information for twelve other families."

No. 7.

Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake Bay, and in the neighboring country.

William Sears, of Talbot county, in Maryland, states, that, about the ——— day of April last, whilst the British squadron, commanded, as he understood, by Admiral Warren, lay about Sharp's Island, in the Chesapeake Bay, he being on the island called Poplar Island, his place of residence, observed some tenders and barges coming off from the squadron in a direction towards the said island. The relator was then in the act of removing his furniture and other property from the island, and hastened therein from seeing the apparent approach of the enemy; but the said tenders and barges, whilst this relator was crossing to the main with his scows and batteaux laden with his property, and in tow of his two schooners, appeared suddenly to put back to their ships. The relator afterwards, in the afternoon and evening of the same day, made two other trips to the island, and succeeded in getting off all his bacon. On the succeeding day, as this relator thinks it was, he again went on the island and got off forty or fifty barrels of his corn and some other articles, without any interruption from the enemy. The relator having, in his first trip, got off his family and slaves, he now watched the movements of the enemy from his farm on the main. On Sunday morning the ——— he saw two tenders come too at Poplar Island and go ashore in barges, and, after some length of time, he saw them depart from the island. The relator, in the afternoon of the last mentioned day, in company with several of his neighbors, went to see what the enemy had done on the island, and found that they had injured nothing, nor taken any thing away except some cider from the cellar. The relator then took off with him as many of his hogs and other articles as he could, and was hurried off by seeing the enemy put off from the squadron with several barges in tow of their tenders. The enemy, on that evening, took possession of the island, and remained that night and a part of the next day, as well as this relator recollects; and, on the last mentioned day, left the island and followed the squadron, which, in the mean time, had moved up the bay. The relator, seeing this, on the next or the second day after, again went on the island, and there found that the enemy had taken and killed about thirty head of black cattle, eighty-six head of old sheep and between twenty and thirty lambs; that they had killed three hundred breeding sows in their beds, whose pigs were found dead; and that they had taken off almost all of his poultry, all he supposes they could catch. From his house (where he had left some of his worst furniture) they took off an old looking glass, worth about four dollars, and some newspapers in a file. They broke several locks and one door, and threw many things about the house. In a house on the island, which had been occupied by James Sears, they broke his desk to pieces and threw about his furniture and other things; but the relator does not now recollect that any thing was taken away.

In testimony whereof, the said William Sears hath hereunto set his hand, this 22d day of June, 1813.

MARYLAND, TALBOT COUNTY, ss.

Be it remembered, that, on this 23d day of June, 1813, William Sears, Esq. of Talbot county, personally appears before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace of the State of Maryland, in and for Talbot county, duly commissioned and qualified, and made oath on the holy evangelists, that the statement of facts, herein contained, is substantially true, to the best of his knowledge, recollection, and belief.

Sworn before me,

PETER DENNY.

STATE OF MARYLAND, TALBOT COUNTY, to wit:

I hereby certify that Peter Denny, Esquire, before whom the above affidavit appears to have been made, and who has thereto subscribed his name, was, at the time of taking and signing the same, and still is, one of the State of Maryland's justices of the peace, in and for the county aforesaid, duly commissioned and qualified.

In testimony whereof, I have hereto set my hand, and affixed the seal of my office, this twenty-fourth day of June, Anno Domini 1813.

[L.s.]

JACOB LOOCKERMAN, Clerk of Talbot County Court.

CECIL COUNTY, STATE OF MARYLAND.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county and State aforesaid, Frisby Henderson, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that, on the 29th day of April, 1813, about seven o'clock A. M. a considerable British force, distributed into thirteen barges, commenced a hostile attack on a landing called Frenchtown, the property of this deponent, in the county aforesaid; that, some days previous thereto, a battery for five guns had been commenced on the wharf, but was in an unfinished state; that, on the approach of the British force, eight or ten men collected, and commenced firing from the battery, and stopped the advance of the barges for some time. The ammunition being expended, the barges then came on, and a firing from them commenced of cannon shot at the battery, and also at the dwelling houses in Frenchtown. The British then landed on the wharf, and immediately set fire to a new store house on the wharf, which at that time contained nothing but a large quantity of oats, the property of this deponent; and also a fishery adjoining the wharf was set on fire at the same time. After burning the said store house and fishery, a force of about two hundred and fifty marines was marched from the wharf, through Frenchtown, and up the river shore, to the dwelling house of this deponent, and demanded the way to the town of Elkton; that finding the river must be crossed on that direction to get to Elkton, the whole force returned to Frenchtown, broke open the upper store house, which was at that time full of goods, part of which was the property of the United States, and the remainder for different merchants of Baltimore, to the amount, probably, of fifty or sixty thousand dollars; and plundered and carried off part of the goods, and set fire to the house and burnt it with the remainder of the goods. This deponent saith, that, by the destruction of the two store houses and fishery, together with the oats and other property he had in the upper store house, burned by the British as aforesaid, he has sustained a loss of about three thousand dollars.

Sworn before me, the subscriber, on this 12th day of June, 1813.

ALEXANDER KINKEAD.

CECIL COUNTY, STATE OF MARYLAND.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Cordelia Penington, living in Frenchtown, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown, and immediately set fire to and burnt the store house and fishery. That, on the British breaking open the upper store house, this deponent went down to the store house, and solicited the commanding officer not to burn the house; he replied, that he came for the purpose of burning the store houses; that they were public property; that this deponent replied, the store houses were private property, and belonged to her brother; the officer said there was public property in it, and should be burnt, and ordered the house set on fire, and burnt it with all the goods they did not carry away.

CECIL COUNTY, STATE OF MARYLAND.

Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Delia Penington, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that she saw the British, on the 29th of April, 1813, land on the wharf at Frenchtown, and immediately set fire to and burn down the store house and fishery. That, after the store house was on fire, the marines were marched up from the wharf; and, at the time of the plundering and burning the upper store house, the marines were formed in the road opposite her mother's house. The officer commanding the marines, who informed this deponent his name was Wybourne, said their orders were to burn the stage stable and destroy the stage coaches. That, on this deponent's soliciting of him not to burn the stables and stages, the officer replied, the question they generally asked when they went to any place was, how they voted at the elections, and inquired of this deponent if her uncle, meaning Mr. Henderson, voted for the war.

Sworn before me, the subscriber, this 12th day of June, 1813.

ALEXANDER KINKEAD.

I do hereby certify that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, I was impressed at my house at Turner's creek, by the British forces, as they passed up the river Sassafas to Frederick and George towns, and was forced to accompany them to the above places. On our way up we were met by two mulatto men in a bateau. Captain Byng, (the name, I believe, of the officer) in whose boat I was, took a white handkerchief, fastened it on his esponent, and was about to enter the bateau with the negroes, in order to proceed up the river, to inform the officer commanding there, that, if he would not fire upon their barges, they would not destroy the town, when he was ordered by the admiral not to do so, who observed, "that he would only send the negroes with the message; that, as they were known to the people in the fort above, he expected that they would believe what they told them." We were then opposite to Mr. Wicke's farm, which I think must be about a mile below the fort. The bateau with the negroes went to the fort as directed, and the British forces soon after followed. I was in the foremost boat, and continued in said boat until their return down the river, after burning the towns, when I was landed on Mr. Withered's shore; and most positively declare, that there was no white flag ever hoisted in her or any of the other boats, to my knowledge; nor did I ever hear any of the British officers or privates say they had ever hoisted a flag, or that one ever had been fired on.

The captain, on his return down the river, declared, that "if he could catch Colonel Veazey, who commanded at the fort above, he would quarter him, and give me part of his quarter for steaks, for that the fire he had received was one of Washington's rounds."

I can't say positively what number of men they lost, as they would only acknowledge five wounded, but think they have sustained greater injury.

Given under my hand, this 9th day of June, 1813.

I certify that I was at the battery on Pearce's Point, on the 6th of May, when a squadron of British barges visited Georgetown; that I had a full view of all the barges until they got possession of the battery on the Cecil shore. and that I saw no white flag displayed from either of the barges.

June 9, 1813.

We, the undersigned, certify that, on the 6th of May last, at the time Admiral Cockburn, with a considerable armed force, attacked and destroyed Frederick and George towns, on Sassafras river, in the State of Maryland, were in or near the breastwork below Fredericktown, under the command of Colonel Thomas W. Veazey. From our position, we had a full and perfect view of the enemy's hostile armament, and saw nothing with it, or preceded or followed it, that indicated or had the appearance of a flag of truce, according to the established usage of civilized nations.

We understand a flag of truce to be a mission for a pacific purpose, accompanied by men without arms, and unprotected by a naval or military force.

The barges moved up the river in close and compact order; the leading boat a few yards ahead of the rest, said to be Admiral Cockburn's, carried a colored flag, and was escorted by not less than fifteen armed barges, and full of armed men, immediately in its rear, and evidently approached in a menacing manner and with hostile intentions.

I do hereby certify that I was at the breastwork near Fredericktown, on the 6th ultimo, when the British came up the river in their barges, and that I did not see a flag of truce, nor do I believe that the commanding officer at the breastwork knew or supposed there was any such thing in or among the barges. As witness my hand this 12th day of June, 1813.

The deposition of Richard Barnaby, of Fredericktown, in Cecil county, Maryland, aged about forty-eight years.

Being duly sworn, deposed and saith, that, on the morning of the 6th of May, after the engagement took place at the fort below this town, that he went a short distance out of town to see some females to a place of safety, and, on his return, he met about twenty of the British troops armed, commanded by an officer, who observed, on meeting of him, here is one of the damned rascals from the fort; and then inquired where the damned rascals which were at the fort had run to, and ordered him to go with him and show them to him. The deponent observing he did not know where they were, the officer swore he was a liar, and drew his sword, and threatened to kill him; one of the men presented a bayonet, and another drew a dirk, and swore if he did not go he would run it through him. He afterwards went with them as far as Captain Francis B. Chandler's house, at which time Francis B. Chandler was going towards his house; and, on their hearing some person call him captain, the officer ordered his men to take him: the admiral coming up at the time, inquired the reason that house was set on fire. Afterwards this deponent returned to his own house with the admiral, and requested of him not to have it set on fire. The admiral promised it should not be burnt if he would furnish him with thirty fowls, which he promised he would do. He furnished them with about thirteen fowls. They then took away and destroyed nearly the whole of his furniture which was in the house, and his provisions, and left him.

The deposition of Francis B. Chandler, of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland, aged about thirty-nine years.

Being duly sworn, deposed and saith, that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, just as he returned from the fort, he was standing near his house, and saw a British party, consisting of about fifty persons, armed and headed by an officer, said to be a post captain, running up to his house; that he, this deponent, stepped upon the steps of the house and requested the officer not to enter; that he caught him by the breast, and called him a damned rascal, and pulled him from off the steps, and then entered the house, with the whole of the party, and gave three cheers, and ordered the men to go to work, and called for fire; that they immediately commenced cutting the stair case, window sash, and breaking the glass, and set the house on fire in three places; that, at this time, Admiral Cockburn arrived, and he, this deponent, begged him to have the fire put out, until he would reason the case with him, and the Admiral asked him what he could do; if he could furnish thirty bullocks, in half an hour; that if he could not, the house should be burnt; and asked him if he would try to get them; and upon this deponent replying in the affirmative, ordered the fire to be put out for the present: that he, this deponent, got upon his horse, and rode about half a mile, when he fell in with Colonel Veazey, and informed him what he was after; and that the Colonel told him to go back and inform the Admiral that he should not have them: that he returned and informed the Admiral of it, who then asked him what else he could do; and if he had a good deal of poultry; and upon replying yes, told him he must have it; and ordered his men to catch it; which was done and carried off; that then, by the great persuasion and entreaty of this deponent's wife and sister, the house was ordered not to be burnt; but the sister of this deponent was much abused by one of their inferior officers, for her exertions in endeavoring to save the property; that this deponent had his warehouse burnt by them, with a considerable quantity of goods in it, and that he himself was a prisoner with them for about three hours.

On this 12th day of June, 1813, personally appeared Jonathan Greenwood, aged thirty years, and being first sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did declare, and say: that, on the morning of the 6th of May last, upon the landing of the British forces at Fredericktown, where this deponent resides, an officer and two sailors came to said deponent's house, and swore that, if they had not found him without arms, they would have thrust him through with their bayonets; they then retired, fell in with some other forces, which soon after came to deponent's house, broke it open, took whatever they conveniently could carry away, and destroyed the rest, with their cutlasses and dirks, and burned it, with his dwelling house, store house, and kitchen. The officers appeared to be most active in the destruction of his property. The houses in the town were, soon after, generally, set on fire and destroyed.

The deposition of Captain John Allen, of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland, aged about fifty-one years.

Being duly sworn, deponent saith, that, on the morning of the 6th May last, when the British forces landed, on the beach of Fredericktown, and marched up through the streets, they fell in with this deponent at his brother James Allen's house. The troops were headed by their commanding officer, (Admiral Cockburn, as this deponent was informed by one of the men) and observed, who the damnation are these that kept such a firing upon us—are they regulars? This deponent answered no, they were militia; he then asked where they were gone, and was told he did not know; he then asked, where are all the men of the town? and was informed they were moved out; he said he had sent word to the shore that, if he was not fired upon, he would not destroy any property, and turned round and observed, to a black boy standing by, you black son of a bitch was one of the persons I sent word by; which the boy denied. He then ordered the men to go on and burn and destroy, which they executed with fidelity. This deponent then begged the admiral to spare his house (meaning the house of James Allen) as his brother's wife was confined up stairs, in a very delicate situation, with an infant only two days old. He then ordered her to be cleared out; Mrs. M'Donnah, his wife's mother, run out, clasping her hands, and begged for God's sake to spare her child, for if she was removed her life would be lost. He then ordered, spare this house. He now marched off after the men that had been gone for some little time, and shortly after returned on horse back. This deponent then requested the Admiral to spare him one house, that he might collect his family together in, after it should please Providence to restore peace between the two nations. He then directed this deponent to get him some fowls, who informed him he had none; he damned him, and asked if he could not get them, and was told no; immediately afterwards a fire was made in the storehouse, and consumed. While George and Frederick towns were in flames, the Admiral, in the presence of this deponent, observed to his officers, well my lads, this looks well; to which no reply was made, and he ordered all hands on board of the boats. That this deponent saw the British, two and a half miles off, coming up, and saw no flag of truce, or any thing like it. That this deponent was of opinion the defence made by Colonel Veazey, and the men under his command, was such as to entitle them to much credit, and justified by every circumstance within his knowledge; though himself and brother are sufferers to nearly one-half of the property in Fredericktown.

JOHN ALLEN.

The deposition of Joshua Ward, living about one mile from Fredericktown, in Cecil county, aged forty-four.

Being duly sworn, deponent saith, that, from the best information he could obtain, from those persons that were left at his house, that a party of British, consisting of between thirty and forty men, commanded by an officer, said to be a post captain, on the 6th of May last, went to his house, and immediately placed a guard around it, inquired particularly for him, and searched every part of the house, swearing they would sacrifice him; being disappointed in finding me, they then began to destroy the tables, chairs, looking glasses, &c.; when they had completed the destruction of such furniture as they could not take off with them, the officer himself took down a pair of hand-some looking glasses, and others of the party took as much of the best bedding, clothing, plate, window curtains, &c. as they could conveniently carry with them; my little boy's clothes they carried off on the point of their bayonets; before they left the house, they put powder in every room below stairs, an officer got fire himself from the kitchen, and had it kindled in the different rooms, and a bed put in the cellar with a part of the broken chairs, tables, &c. and a fire kindled; they then left the house, but continued in the yard until the fire was bursting from the windows, and swore, that, if there was an attempt to extinguish the fire, they would put the person to death; that they intended to return and burn every thing on the farm; they fired at one of my sons, not twelve years of age, as he was driving off a flock of sheep.

The deposition of Toilus Robertson, aged about thirty-four years, who did live within about one mile of Fredericktown, Cecil county, Maryland.

This deponent states, that, on the morning of the 6th of May, he was at the breastwork near Fredericktown, at the time the British armament came up the Sassafaras river; that he saw no flag of truce; that, after the militia were obliged to retreat, he returned home, and in a very short time saw a party of the British coming towards his house, and he and his family left their house, except two black women and a black man, who state that the British took the deponent's household furniture, and piled it up in the yard before the house door, and set them on fire, which communicated to the house, and consumed it also; the barn, which stood about one hundred yards from the house, was set on fire and consumed. This deponent lost all his household goods and provisions. He saw Fredericktown in flames, previous to his leaving his house, which alarmed himself and family to that degree, that he abandoned his house for their safety.

The deposition of Moses N. Cannon, aged about thirty-two, who lives within about one-half mile of Fredericktown, in Cecil county, Maryland.

This deponent states that he was at the breastwork, near Fredericktown, on the 6th May last, when the British armament came up the Sassafra river; that he saw no flag of truce; that, after the militia were obliged to retreat, he returned home, and was occupied in turning horses out of his wheat field, when a party of the British came to his house; he rode up to them, and they informed him that he was their prisoner; and on his observing that he was in their power, they inquired of him, if he had any thing to drink, and he answering in the negative, they told him they had got something to eat, and asked him if he wanted his house burnt; and he answering in the negative, they told him to go then to the captain, that he was in the house, and would set fire to it; and on his going towards the house he met the person whom they called the captain, with another person with him, loaded with his, this deponent's, bed clothes, a pair of boots, and a number of other articles, carrying them towards his men, who were formed outside the yard; at the time, an officer on horseback rode up and inquired of the deponent where the damned militia were; he observed to him that they had retreated, pointing at the same time towards a wood; he observed he must burn the deponent's house, and on the deponent expostulating with him, and stating the disadvantage he would labor under, in case his house was burnt, he then inquired of him the road to the mouth of Elk river, and if he, the officer, could march his men there, and the deponent observed that his Government would not permit him to give him any instructions; and the officer observed that he knew that as well as the deponent, but that he might trust a British officer, and smiled, and turned his horse, and ordered his men to march, and they went off, without burning the house or asking any more questions. The deponent then went to a neighboring house to see about a part of his family, and on his return back towards his house, he was fired on by a party of the British, stationed in the public road, about one hundred and fifty yards from the deponent's house; he then retreated across the field, and abandoned his house; he saw, after riding from the party who fired on him, a party going towards his house, who, as he supposes, destroyed, or took away, the residue of his household goods, and broke the window glass, sash, doors, and did considerable damage to his house. Fredericktown was on fire about the time the first party of the British came to the deponent's house.

SASSAFRAS NECK, Cecil County, June 28, 1813.

I do hereby certify, that, being in the fort at Fredericktown, on Sassafra river, on the morning of the 6th of May last, when a battle took place with the British and the militia, under the command of Colonel Thomas W. Veazey, I distinctly saw the enemy, from the time they first came in view, and discerned no flag of truce, or any thing resembling one. The enemy, after some resistance, landed, burned Frederick and George towns, and destroyed a great deal of other private property. My house, about eight miles on the river from the fort, was plundered by them on their way down the river.

The within is an inventory of property burned, otherwise destroyed, or taken away, on the sixth day of May last, by the British forces, commanded by Rear Admiral Cockburn, in Frederick and George towns, and the vicinity thereof, situated on Sassafra river, Eastern Shore, State of Maryland; taken by the subscribers, on oath, when they had a competent knowledge thereof; but when they had not a satisfactory knowledge of the property destroyed as aforesaid, schedules thereof were taken from the owners upon oath. The subscribers have sufficient reasons to believe, indeed, that property to a very considerable amount has been destroyed or taken away by the aforesaid British forces, from the above mentioned places, which they can obtain no correct or satisfactory account of.

EASTERN SHORE, Maryland,
MARENGO, 18th July, 1813.

SIR:

Multipled engagements and forgetfulness, succeeding each other, have prevented my forwarding to you this statement of the depredations committed on my property at Sharp's Island, by the enemy, while in the Chesapeake. On the 12th of April, while I was in the act of removing my stock, &c. they landed upwards of a hundred men and prevented my removing any thing. They detained me on the island until the seventeenth, in which time they were principally engaged in getting water. Declarations were made by Admiral Warren and the other officers, that every thing of the stock or grain kind, taken away, should be paid for at a fair price. Admiral Cockburn was, as I am informed, at this time sent up the bay with the advance detachment of the fleet. Admiral Warren's ship and a few tenders only, remained about the island. At that time they took twenty-eight hogs, four sheep, twelve cattle, thirteen bushels of Indian corn, and informed me that they should allow the following prices for them: Hogs \$2 $\frac{1}{2}$, sheep \$2 $\frac{1}{2}$, cattle \$13 a piece, corn \$1 per bushel. On my return to the island some weeks afterwards, the accounts were made out to the amount of \$247, bills on their Government for the amount, except about \$54 in specie. Before I returned to the island, the fleet had all gone down the bay. I understood from the inhabitants, living in sight of the island, that the enemy had paid the island another visit, and had made a general sweep of the stock. On my arrival at the island I found it too true. They had taken all my sheep, in number 91; sixty-five of which were one-half and three-fourths blood merinoes, and one full blood ram, which cost me \$95, eighteen head of cattle, and about twenty hogs. They left a bill on their Government for \$133 and cash to the amount of \$40. They took all the poultry, shot in a wanton manner one of the finest boars which this country could produce, and which was much admired by Admiral Warren for his uncommon beauty and breed, and who forbid, as a favor to me, that he should be disturbed. They bayoneted others, which they left wounded, and which would have been lost, had my overseer not saved a part by killing them. They left nothing for the sheep only a promise of \$2 per head. I have estimated my loss, arising principally from this last visit, at \$1,203, as will appear by the following statement:

18 cattle, at $13,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	$234 00
20 hogs, at $4,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	80 00
55 $\frac{3}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ blood lambs, at \$10,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	550 00
36 common stock with fleece, at $6,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	216 00
4 taken at the first visit, merinoes, at $10,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	40 00
								$1,200 00
Deduct \$2 $\frac{1}{2}$ paid for the first four,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10 00
								$1,110 00
1 full blood merino ram,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	95 00
								1,205 00
Bills and cash left,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	173 00
								1,032 00
Trouble and expense of reinstating stock,	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	100 00
								$1,132 00

I will give those prices to any person who will reinstate the same number of stock and kine, at the close of the war, or deliver them at any of my farms, the ram excepted, as I have raised others of the same kind. The injury done me by breaking up the flock of sheep is far beyond the prices stated, as they cannot be reinstated for several years. The destruction of the ram was a wanton outrage, as he was not fit to be eaten. He was bayoneted, and I believe left on the island. This, I presume, was aimed at our manufactures.

There will be a loss of at least 20 per cent. upon the bills if sold here, and probably a total loss if I wait for the British Government to pay them. Add this to the amount above given, makes the total loss $1,203.

JACOB GIBSON.

UNITED STATES' FRIGATE ADAMS, July 24, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose the copy of a letter from Lieutenant Reed, giving the particulars of the loss of the schooner Asp, and the inhuman conduct of the enemy to her commander, Mr. Segourney. Another letter from Lieutenant Reed, of the same date, mentions that no part of the enemy's force were then above Blackstone's Island. He further states, that, in their attempts to land on the Virginia shore, they have been invariably repulsed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. MORRIS.

HON. WILLIAM JONES, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

UNITED STATES' CUTTER SCORPION, POTOMAC, July 23d, 1813.

SIR:

It is with much pain I have to inform you of the death of poor Segourney, who was killed a few days ago, (I cannot say when) gallantly defending his vessel. He was attacked whilst lying in Kinsale creek, by three launches, and after a sharp contest beat them off. They, however, on gaining the mouth of the creek, were reinforced by two more, and again renewed the conflict. About this time Mr. Segourney got wounded through the body. The crew, on seeing him fall, having no officer capable of leading them, jumped overboard and gained the shore; when the enemy, who by this time succeeded in getting on board, finding the colors still flying and Segourney sitting up, barbarously knocked his brains out with the butt end of a musket.

At the commencement of the action, Mr. Segourney thinking them too strong for him, had ran the schooner on shore, in which situation the enemy found her, and not being able to get her off, set her on fire. The militia, however, (who must have been slow in collecting) by this time got down and beat them off, retook the schooner, and extinguished the flames.

They have since buried Mr. Segourney with the honors of war.

I have not heard any thing of the crew.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. C. REED.

Captain CHARLES MORRIS, United States' Frigate Adams.

P. S. All this I have from authority which cannot be doubted.

Extract of a letter from Midshipman H. M. McClintock, dated Kinsale, July 19th, 1813, to the Secretary of the Navy Department.

"We were attacked by five boats; we continued doing the same as before, but having so few men we were unable to repel the enemy; when they boarded us they refused giving any quarter; there were upwards of fifty men on our decks, which compelled us to leave the vessel, as the enemy had possession; they set her on fire and retreated."

Extract of a letter from John Tuberville, Major of the 2d Brigade 111th Regiment of the Virginia Militia, dated Kinsale, July 20th, 1813.

"I arrived myself at the place of capture before the colors were lowered, and am confident that, even at that time, their numbers, amounting to between sixty and seventy, might have been reduced one half, before they could make their escape, could I have commanded twenty determined men. The gallant commandant fell before the enemy boarded him, by a ball which passed through his body, but continued to fight to the last extremity. When there were forty or fifty of the enemy on deck, one of the schooner's crew asked for quarter, which was denied him. At this instant the few men remaining made their escape by swimming to the shore, and Mr. Segourney was instantly shut through the head. The vessel was shortly set on fire, and the barges moved off. The officers fought bravely, and Mr. M^cClintock defended the vessel with much credit to himself, after the commanding officer was wounded."

HON. WILLIAM JONES, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

NEWBERN, July 19th, 1815.

SIR: On Sunday night, the 11th instant, an English fleet, consisting of one seventy-four, three frigates, one brig, and three schooners, anchored about one mile from Ocracock bar; about day-break we were informed of it at Portsmouth, by persons from Ocracock. I immediately got up and ordered the cutter to get under way and run up to Newbern and give the alarm, which she did, but made a very narrow escape from the barges, as she was obliged to beat over the swash against wind and tide, while they could row a straight course. I believe Admiral Cockburn had intended to have visited Newbern for the purpose of robbing the banks, but was prevented by the cutter making her escape to give the alarm. Indeed he said such was his intention, and was very much exasperated because the barges did not take her. I believe there were as many as twenty-five barges that crossed the bar, and I think there could not have been less than three thousand regulars, marines, and sailors in them: they captured the privateer brig Anacosta of New York, and the letter of marque schooner Atlas, of Philadelphia, both valuable fast sailing vessels; they then landed on Portsmouth and Ocracock, and such a cruel wanton destruction of property was scarcely ever witnessed; they broke in pieces almost every species of furniture, cut open beds, and scattered the feathers, and even carried their villany to such a length as to rob many women of their children's clothes without leaving them a second suit to their backs. The officers pretended there should be no depredations committed; and when complaints were made to them they would say, "point out the fellow and he shall be corrected," well knowing it was impossible to identify any one of them, among such a number of strangers. They took off of the two places two hundred cattle, four hundred sheep, and sixteen hundred fowls, for which they pretended to pay the inhabitants, some of whom I believe received more than compensation, and others received nothing; in short, they have ruined almost all on the places. I had time to send my trunk with what bonds and money there are belonging to the United States, on board the cutter, which escaped; I also had time to bring a few of the most valuable papers belonging to the office; it is well I did, for they destroyed my office entirely, every paper in it, both public and private; they destroyed my library and all other property of mine they could find, about eight hundred dollars' worth; and then sent me on board the seventy-four, where they detained me two days, until they had embarked and ready to sail. I was on shore two days before they discovered I was a public officer; I presume they sent me on board to prevent observation. After they had kept me until they were ready to start, they turned me adrift in the ocean in a small boat with four Spaniards, not one of whom was acquainted with the bar more than myself, in consequence of which we got into the breakers and very narrowly escaped being all lost; all these things were transacted under the direction of the humane Admiral Cockburn. I believe, from the conversation I overheard, that they intend to visit Beaufort, then Wilmington, and so on to the southward.

My returns will be made as soon as I can get what remain in some kind of order.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. S. SINGLETON, Collector.

HON. WILLIAM JONES, Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

On the morning of the 3d May, the day the British, under the command of Admiral Cockburn, made the attack on the town of Havre de Grace, on my return from the commons where I had deposited some ammunition, I observed an officer on the horse of Mr. James Wood of this place, a few paces in a southwest direction of the church. At first sight I was of the opinion it was one of our own officers, which I thought to be Adjutant M^cKinna, having heard but a few moments before, the voice of John O'Neill crying out in words to this effect: "damn it men, return; we can certainly beat the rascals off." I was, however, deceived, as this officer was the person who took O'Neill prisoner while in the act of entreating the militia to return. Not knowing at that time O'Neill was taken by him, I advanced in a direction towards the church on my way to the magazine, to assist in carrying off more ammunition, when I discovered in the front of the church a file of marines. To the best of my recollection, I was then at a distance of from 100 to 150 yards from the officer on horseback, and I think about the same from three militia men, when this officer (said to be Lieutenant Westfall) with a drawn sword in his hand, it being the only flag he carried, cried out two or three times, "will you surrender?" One of the militia men made answer, but what it was I could not distinctly hear, and immediately fired on him, and it is said wounded him in the hand. Finding it impossible to reach the magazine, the marines being then round the church, which was contiguous to it, I bent my course towards Mrs. Sears' tavern, in hopes of finding some of the British officers there, and by entreaty to save some of the private property, which I was fearful would be destroyed. On reaching Mrs. Sears' sign post, I found the first division of boats had just reached the wharf, and two large guns were fired, one of which threw a ball on the roof and knocked off some shingles; the firing then ceased, when two other gentlemen with myself advanced on the wharf and asked for the commander of that division of boats. A person, whom I supposed to be a midshipman from his appearance, answered "Captain Lawrance will be here directly;" he then asked a number of questions, such as, "have you any newspapers? how many militia have you? and where are they stationed? where is your post office?" &c. &c. to all of which we carefully avoided giving any direct answer. Some of the barges then warped up along side of the wharf, when I thought it most prudent to leave them, being fearful that I should be made a prisoner. I then walked up towards the ferry house, followed by the two gentlemen who went with me on the wharf; we were met by an officer, who immediately ordered us back. After reaching the lower end of the wharf, the midshipman before mentioned, said, "sir, this is Captain Lawrance," pointing to the officer; Lawrance then addressed us in words to this amount: "what have you got to say for yourselves; where is your mayor or chief magistrate?" He was told we had no mayor, and that there was no magistrate in the place. He then asked, "are you prepared to ransom the town?" I asked him what sum he demanded; he said about $20,000. We told him no such sum could be raised. "Why, then," he replied, "did you fire on us; had you not done that, and hung out a flag, we would have treated you better." I then asked him what was their intention in coming, and in what manner they would have acted had a flag been hung out on their approach? To the first question he gave no answer, but after a short pause observed, "about one half the sum now demanded would have been taken." He was then told, small as that might appear to him, it could not have been raised. "Then," says he, turning hastily around, "in three quarters of an hour your town shall be in flames; you shall now feel the effects of war." The said Captain Lawrance then went into the tavern of Mrs. Sears, and with two or three men brought out a bale or box of goods, (which was said to have been lodged there the night before, belonging to a lady in Georgetown) and placed a few paces in front of the house; another officer (name unknown) entered afterwards, and brought out a second box, and placed it near the first. Captain Lawrance then turned to him and said, "sir, I have placed a guard here; we must now attend to other business; we will see to this," (pointing to the goods), "to-night." The order to fire the houses was then given, and Captain Lawrance walked down street and entered the store of S. Hogg & Co., the door of which had been previously broken open, and a few men were in the act of taking off wearing apparel, &c.; others had got to the counting room desk in search of money, scattering the papers, &c. on the floor. The shameful act of pilfering the goods was however reserved for the redoubtable Captain Lawrance; he it was who first began the shameful scene, so disgraceful to an officer, by taking down knives, forks, &c. saying "ha! the very thing we want;" and, turning round, called in a fresh set of plunderers, and said "boys, here is fine plunder;" the men did not wait a second invitation, but set in with their worthy leader, and in a short time emptied the store, excepting some articles which were of little value.

WM. T. KILLPATRICK.

P. S. When I found that Captain Lawrance ordered his men in the store, and gave the order to plunder, I remonstrated with him on the impropriety of such proceeding, and observed that, with civilized nations at war, private property had always been respected. He replied, in a hasty manner, "you ought to be more particular in your choice of representatives; you wanted war, and you shall now feel the effects."

ELIJAH DAVIS.

Personally came James Wood, of Havre de Grace, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for Harford county, and made oath, according to law, that, on Monday morning, the 3d of May, 1813, between daylight and sunrise, as he was riding in the town of Havre de Grace, he discovered some men in the act of hauling up the shore a piece of artillery that had been mounted on the battery, and from their dress and the dulness of the morning, he took them to be Americans, nor did he discover his mistake until he was made prisoner and compelled to dismount; upon which the officer commanding the British immediately mounted his horse. A short period after, he was ordered on board of a barge in company with some other prisoners, which barge was moved up to Mrs. Sears' wharf, in company with other barges. Some short time after, he discovered a house at some distance from the water to be on fire, which excited some surprise, (the house belonged to Mr. John Tucker.) He observed to the cockswain of the boat, there was a house on fire, and asked him if he did not suppose it to be set on fire by a rocket; he replied, "perhaps it might." Directly after, I saw the British kindling a fire in the yard of Mrs. Sears, and asked them for what that was intended. The cockswain answered "to set that house on fire." I then asked them, "why, you are not going to burn the building?" The reply from an officer on board the same barge (and who, I believe, had not been on shore) was, "yes, sir, we shall lay your town in ashes;" and in a few minutes I saw a general conflagration of the greater part of the best buildings, during the time I remained on board, which was until a very short time before they left the place. I saw the officers as well as men in small squads bringing on board the barges, as they lay at the wharf, plundered property of almost every description, and depositing it. During the time, an officer brought on board a large trunk or box, and calling to one of the men said, "I will give you two dollars to take care of this for me; this is my own plunder; this was a stage passenger's property, and therefore is mine." He further declares that he has no knowledge of any flag of truce being held out by the British, nor does he believe there was any.

Personally came Roxana Moore, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of Harford county, State of Maryland, and made oath, according to law, that on Monday morning, the 3d of May, in consequence of the firing of the British into the town of Havre de Grace, I fled for safety (my husband being from home) into the cellar of the house in which I lived; that, upon the firing having stopped, I came up, and meeting an officer on horseback, and who was wounded in the hand, I applied to him for protection, fearing injury from some of the men. He replied, "I will not hurt you, nor shall my men, but I will burn your house." I answered him that I could not get out of it with my little children. He replied, "then I will burn your house with you and your children in it." They proceeded a little further, and, after having set fire to my neighbor Richard Mansfield's tavern house, a number of them returned and entered my house, and began to pillage and plunder. They took the whole of my bed clothes, my own clothes, and all my children's, even to my youngest child's, a baby not two months old, together with my cradle furniture. Upon my soliciting them to spare me some few things, one replied, "I will take every thing I can, it's what we came for," and immediately seized a shawl from around my neck, and which was at that time nearly all the covering my little baby, whom I held in my arms, had, and carried it away; they more than once put fire to the house, but from the exertions of some of my neighbors it was as often put out.

She further declares that she never saw any flag of truce held out by the British, nor doth she believe there was any.

Personally came Richard Mansfield, a citizen of Havre de Grace, before the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace for Harford county, Maryland, and made oath according to law, that on Monday morning, the 3d of May, 1813, being in his own house about sunrise, and viewing the British barges as they came up the river, they keeping up a continual firing into the town, until they reached Mrs. Sears' wharf, being about two hundred yards below this deponent's, when the firing ceased; they then landed, and, as well as he could discover at the distance from which he stood, immediately launched a 24 pounder on board a ferry boat, which bilged her, as she began to settle in the water as soon as they moved her out, and in a few minutes went down; during this time, two of the barges kept moving slowly up towards this deponent's, and as soon as they landed, a petty officer ran to this deponent's ferry boat and called out, "there is nothing in her;" "cast her off," was the reply, which was instantly done. This deponent and his son being at this time on the wharf, discovered a British officer on horseback with several of his men at his heels, making to his house, upon which he returned and met them a few yards in front of his house. This officer, (whose name this deponent since learned was Lieutenant Westfall, and who was wounded through the hand) immediately ordered the house to be set on fire. This deponent remonstrated against such procedure, urging its being unprecedented among civilized nations at war, to burn and destroy private property; that when nations were at war all public property became fair objects of destruction, but that private property had heretofore been respected, except such as might unfortunately be injured by the usual and customary mode of warfare, or that might be taken as provisions. His reply was, "by G—d it should be burnt." This deponent and a Mr. King, who came with the officer, solicited for the moveable property that was in the house, it being furniture, stating to him that that was this deponent's only dependence, and was all he had. He replied generally, by ordering his men to burn. During this conversation the men were in the house breaking and destroying every thing before them. Mr. King then begged the officer for one hour, saying that whatever could not be saved in that time might go. The officer's reply was, "one hour, no, by G—d, not five minutes; burn that house." Immediately they commenced, and had the dwelling house on fire in four different places in a few minutes. This deponent, together with Mr. King, continued to solicit for permission to save some furniture; after some time, Lieutenant Westfall observed, "you may save what you can, and what you can save shall not be disturbed." Exertions were then made by this deponent, his son, and Mr. King, to save from the devouring flames, which proved successful for a short time; but a few minutes convinced us what little dependence was to be placed on the word of a British officer, as the men, aided by officers, carried off what had been, by great exertions and considerable risk, saved from the flames. The enemy had been busily employed breaking, destroying, and carrying away, until the flames got to such height as to render it unsafe to go within the walls. They then commenced upon such property as this deponent had saved, carrying off every portable article, until their barges were stowed; ripping up beds, throwing the feathers to the air, cutting up chairs, breaking open desks, &c. &c. The officer who made the attack on a walnut desk, refused to have it unlocked, but, after breaking open the lid, discovered the inner door, exultingly exclaimed, "ah! I am used to such things," or, "I am acquainted with opening desks," or some expression to that amount, and immediately broke it open, and continued his search as if for money. After having destroyed and carried off nearly the whole of this deponent's property, and seeing the buildings burnt down, they moved down to Mrs. Sears' wharf, and joined the other barges. This depoment was then advised by some of his friends to apply to some of the officers and endeavor to get some of his property back, which he did, but found such obstacles in the way that, after getting a looking glass, and some two or three articles of small value, he gave it up; but upon meeting the admiral in person, he renewed his application, and after some time, was directed to go on board and get what he could; this deponent then stated the impossibility of succeeding without an officer to accompany him. An officer was sent, but after repeated attempts to get some of his property, he was, from the abuse and threats of being run through with a sword from an officer of marines, for claiming his property, compelled to decline any further exertions, after getting another looking glass, and a few more very trifling articles.

This deponent's observations being confined to his own house, and its immediate neighborhood, which was at the upper end of the village, he was not an eye-witness to their savagelike conduct generally. One dwelling house and grocery store, the property of Mr. George Bartoll, which stood a few rods below, and in front of this deponent's, he saw the enemy plundering, and breaking every thing to pieces, and ended by setting it on fire and burning it down; a number of houses were set on fire that were not consumed; a number they only robbed and broke the doors and windows; among the latter was the church, in which not one solitary window was left whole. During the time this deponent was on Mrs. Sears' wharf, and on board the barges, he solicited for the prisoners, citizens of the town, to be set at liberty, naming those that he immediately saw and knew, among whom was James Sears, a youth of about seventeen, and John O'Neal, a naturalized Irishman, both of whom were, in a most positive manner, refused; and, as soon as O'Neal's name was mentioned, the officer, to whom the application was made, replied, "no!" swearing he would have O'Neal hung if he could. O'Neal has since been discharged on parole. This deponent declares that he has no knowledge of any flag of truce being sent by the British; nor does he believe there was any.

Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service. Abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle or murdered after the surrender to the British. The pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses after surrender to the British, under the guarantee of protection.

Extract of a letter from Augustus B. Woodward, Esquire, to General Proctor.

DETROIT, February 2, 1813.

"They [the inhabitants of Michigan] have entertained a constant apprehension that, when the American forces approach the territory, and when an engagement has taken place, the fury of the savage mind at the sight of blood, and in reflecting on the dead they lose, and, perhaps, on the retaliatory treatment of prisoners, or of the dead, which their cruel mode of warfare is always likely to produce, might drive them to an ignoble revenge on the prisoners they find in the country, and the inhabitants of it, who are American citizens. They, therefore, pressed this subject on your attention, previous to the battle of the 23d of January, 1813; and felt satisfied with your assurance that you considered your own honor pledged for their effectual protection.

"Since the result of that battle, facts are before their faces which they cannot shut their eyes upon. Some of them are, perhaps, unknown to yourself. I will enumerate some which I believe there will be no difficulty in establishing beyond the reach of contradiction.

"First. Some of the prisoners, after the capitulation of the 22d of January, 1813, have been tomahawked by the savages.

"Second. Some of the prisoners, after that capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Third. Some of the prisoners, after that capitulation, have been burnt by the savages.

"Fourth. Some of the inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, after the capitulation, have been shot by the savages.

"Fifth. The houses of some of the inhabitants of the territory, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been burnt by the savages.

"Sixth. Some of the inhabitants, American citizens, after the capitulation, have been pillaged by the savages."

A. W. McLean, Esq. to Mr. Woodward.

SANDWICH, February 9, 1813.

SIR: You will have the goodness to appoint a day for the purpose of adducing, before Colonel Proctor, such proofs as you may have, to substantiate the assertions in your letter to him, relative to the slaughter of the enemy's sick and wounded, on the 22d of January last.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. W. McLEAN, Aid-de-camp.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Woodward to General Proctor.

SANDWICH, February 10, 1813.

"I had the honor to receive, on the third day of this month, a verbal message from you, communicated to me by Major Muir, requesting me to procure some evidence of the massacre of the American prisoners on the 23d day of January last.

"I met with only a few persons at Detroit who are inhabitants of the river Raisin, nor was it altogether a pleasant task to those to relate, in these times, the scenes they have beheld. Some of them, however, appeared before a magistrate, and I send you copies of what they have stated. It will occur to you, sir, immediately, that what any of them state on the information of others, though not direct evidence in itself, leads to the source where it may be obtained.

"In communicating your message, Major Muir added something having relation to American citizens who might be willing to take the oath to the King.

"It will be obvious to you, sir, that, in a state of open and declared war, a subject or citizen of one party cannot transfer his allegiance to the other party, without incurring the penalties of treason; and, while nothing can excuse his guilt, so neither are those innocent who lay temptation before him.

"The principles adopted by the United States on the subject of expatriation are liberal, but are perfectly inapplicable to a public enemy in time of war.

"Some of the French inhabitants of the territory of Michigan, citizens of the United States of America, have been much urged on this subject, and are apprehensive of being further troubled.

"I had the further honor of receiving, on the 8th instant, your verbal message, by your aid-de camp, Mr. Mc Lean, acquainting me that there was no capitulation on the 22d of January, and that the prisoners surrendered at discretion.

"I, therefore, beg pardon for that mistake.

"The principles, however, of the law of nations impose an obligation almost equally strong."

TERRITORY OF MICHIGAN, } ss.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, one of the justices of the peace in the district of Detroit, Joseph Robert, an inhabitant on the river aux Raisins, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposes and says, that, on the next day after the battle on the said river Raisin, a short time after sunrise, he saw the Indians kill the American prisoners with their tomahawks, and that they shot several, to wit, three; that the Indians set the house on fire, and that, in going out, the prisoners were massacred and killed as aforesaid, that is to say: three were shot, the others were killed in the houses, and burnt with the houses. The Indians burnt first the house of Jean Baptiste Jereau, and afterwards that of Gabriel Godfroy, Jr. The deponent has been informed that there were about forty-eight or forty-nine prisoners in the two houses. The deponent has seen dead bodies on the highway which the hogs were tearing and eating. Mr. Brunot told the deponent that the Indians had killed those of the prisoners who were least wounded, and that the others were burnt alive.

Antoine Cuellarie and Alexis Salliot, inhabitants of river Ecorces, told the deponent that two prisoners had been burnt in the house of Grandon, on the river aux Sables. The deponent has heard that the Indians had tore out the hearts of the prisoners, and had brought them still smoking into the houses, but did not recollect the names of the informants; he believes, however, they were men worthy of credit.

The deponent says further, that, after the first action on the river Raisin, the Indians fired on one named Solo, son-in-law to Stephen Labeau, an inhabitant on the river aux Sables, when returning from the house of Grandon to his father-in-law; on his arrival, he halloped to his father-in-law to open the door, saying that he was mortally wounded; Stephen Labeau opened the door and told his son-in-law to throw himself on his bed, but that, in trying to move, he fell dead. An Indian knocked at the door, and Labeau having opened it, received a ball in his breast, and fell dead. The son of Labeau made his escape; the Indians shot several shots at him, which did not reach him.

The deponent says further, that Baptiste Coueur was killed near the house of the deponent, on the day of the second battle on the river Raisin, a little after sunrise.

The deponent says further, that the Indians have often threatened to burn his house and barn, if he did not march with them against the Americans. The deponent says he is an American citizen.

The deponent says that several of his neighbors have told him that they have received the same threat. Other settlements have been threatened with fire. The mills and houses on the river faux Roches were burnt in the month of September last, after the capitulation of Detroit. And further this deponent said not.

TERRITORY OF MICHIGAN, } ss.

Be it remembered, that, on this day, February the fourth, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, personally came before the undersigned, a justice of the peace for the district aforesaid, viz: John M'Donnell, an inhabitant of the city of Detroit, who, after being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposed and saith, that a few days after the battle of the 22d January last, (at the river Raisin) he was personally present at the house of James May, Esquire, when he heard the said James May ask Mr. William Jones, the acting agent for the Indian Department, if there would be any impropriety in purchasing the prisoners from the Indians; and that he heard the said William Jones say, "that he thought there would be no impropriety in purchasing them, but would not undertake to authorize any person to do so;" that in consequence of which, this deponent purchased three or four of the prisoners; amongst the number was one by the name of ——— Hamilton, a private in the Kentucky volunteers, who declared to this deponent that on the first or second day after the battle at river Raisin, on 22d January last, as he and some of his fellow prisoners were marching with the Indians between this place and river Raisin, they came up to where one of the prisoners was burnt, the life just expiring, and an Indian kicking the ashes off his back, saying "damned son of a bitch."

This deponent also further deposes as aforesaid, that Doctor Bowers, a surgeon's mate of the Kentucky volunteers, who was purchased by him and some other gentlemen, stated to this deponent "that he was left to take care of the wounded after the battle, but felt rather timid on account of the savages, but that he received such assurances from Captain or Colonel Elliott of the safety of himself as well as the remaining prisoners, he concluded to stay, as sleighs were promised to be sent to fetch them away the next morning; that near about daylight of the morning following the day of the battle, the Indians came into the house where said Bowers was with the other prisoners, and proceeded to plunder and tomahawk such as could not walk, and stripping the said Bowers and the wounded prisoners of all their clothes; that while the said Bowers and two other prisoners, named Searles and Bradford, as near as this deponent can recollect, were sitting by the fire in the Indian camp, an Indian came up who appeared to be drunk, and called the said Searles, as near as this deponent can recollect, a Madison or Washington, then took up a tomahawk and struck the said Searles on the shoulder; that the said Searles caught hold of the tomahawk and held it for some time; that the said Bowers advised the said Searles to submit to his fate; with that the Indian gave him a second blow on the head, killed, scalped, and stript him; during this time the said Bowers and Bradford were personally present, and being apprehensive for their own safety, that he, Bowers, ran and came up to the old chief (who sold him to this deponent and others) who took him under his protection, and was very kind to him whilst he remained with him. This deponent further deposes, that he has reason to believe the aforesaid Bowers and Hamilton are now at Sandwich, and if applied to, they could give more ample information relative to the particulars of the aforesaid. And further this deponent saith not.

DETROIT, 4th February, 1813.

DEAR SIR:

I had a conversation with Mr. Smart, after leaving your house to-day, who had a conversation with Bowers and Bradford. He observes that I have made several material errors in my affidavit before you this day. He says the prisoner killed was of the name of Blythe, instead of Searles; and mentioned some other errors that differ widely from what I have sworn to, so that I think it is a pity that Bowers' and Bradford's own affidavits could not be had, instead of mine.

Note from Mr. M'Donell to Mr. Lyons, his clerk.

I wish you to mention to Judge Woodward that application is made for me by a friend on the other side to remain till the navigation opens. On that account, I hope that he will keep back the deposition that I have made regarding the murders committed by the savages on the river Raisin, as he has much better testimony to substantiate facts than what I have sworn to on hearsay; and, as I am sure, if the colonel was even disposed to hear my application, that affidavit will be enough to send me off; or, else, if I was allowed to remain, Elliot would set the Indians on me.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, one of the justices of the peace in the district of Detroit, Antoine Boulard, of the river aux Raisins, who, being sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposed and says, that, on the next day after the last battle on river aux Raisins, he saw the Indians kill the secretary of the American General, who was on the horse of the Indian who had taken him prisoner, with a rifle shot; that the prisoner fell on one side, and an Indian came forward with a sabre, finished him, scalped him, stript him, and carried away his clothes. The body remained two days on the highway, before the door of the deponent, and was part eat up by the hogs. Afterwards, the deponent, together with Francois Lasselle, Hubert Lacroix, Charles Chovin, and Louis Lajoie, took up the corpse, at dusk of the evening, and carried into a field near the woods, where the hogs did not go. They dared not bury it, for fear of being surprised by the Indians. And further this deponent saith not.

I hereby certify, that, the next day after the last battle on the river aux Raisins, the secretary of the American General was taken, near the door of the deponent, was wounded, and placed on a horse; that seven or eight Indians were near the house, one of whom shot him in the head with a rifle; that he did not fall off his horse until another Indian, drawing a sabre, struck him on the head several times, and then he fell to the ground, was scalped, and stript of his clothes, and left on the road, where he remained one day and a half. I, the deponent, with Francois Lasselle, Hubert Lacroix, and Louis Chovin, on the evening of the second day, took up the body, carried it to the skirts of the woods, and covered it with a few branches, but could not stay to bury it for fear of the Indians that were in the neighborhood; and, on the next day after the last battle, I was near the house of Gabriel Godfroy, Jr., and the house of Jean Batiste Jereame, where a great number of prisoners were collected; and that I heard the screaming of the prisoners whom the Indians were tomahawking; that the savages set the houses on fire, and went off.

I certify, that the bodies of the Americans killed at the battle of la Rivière aux Raisins, of the 22d of January last, remain unburied, and that I have seen the hogs and dogs eating them. The hogs appeared to be rendered mad by so profuse a diet of Christian flesh. I saw the houses of Mr. Jerome and Mr. Godfroy on fire, and have heard that there were prisoners in them. The inhabitants did not dare to bury the dead, on account of the Indians. The inhabitants have been threatened by the Indians, if they did not take up arms against the Americans.

The Hurons and the other tribes of Indians, assembled at the Miami rapids, to the inhabitants of the river Raisin:

FRIENDS, LISTEN! You have always told us you would give us any assistance in your power.

We, therefore, as the enemy is approaching us, within twenty-five miles, call upon you all to rise up, and come here immediately, bringing your arms along with you.

Should you fail at this time, we will not consider you in future as friends, and the consequences may be very unpleasant.

We are well convinced you have no writing forbidding you to assist us.

To the Honorable JUDGE WOODWARD, Detroit.

Extract from the report of Ensign Isaac L. Baker, Agent for the prisoners taken after the battle of Frenchtown, January 22d, 1813, to Brigadier General Winchester, dated BRITISH NIAGARA, February 26, 1813.

"For the greatest number of our unfortunate fellow soldiers being sent from Detroit we are indebted to the exertions of our prisoner fellow-citizens there, who, with an unexampled generosity, when they saw their countrymen driven through the streets like sheep to a market, lavished their wealth for their ransom. Nor was the procurement of our liberty all. We had been almost entirely stripped by the Indians. Clothes, such as the exigency of the occasion permitted to be prepared, were furnished us.

"On the 8th instant, Colonel Proctor ordered me to make out a return of all the prisoners who were killed by the Indians subsequent to the battle, agreeable to the best information I could collect. The enclosed return, marked B, was produced by this order. I might have added the gallant Captain Nathaniel Gray; S. Hart, deputy inspector general; Captain Virgil M'Crackin, of Colonel Allen's regiment; Captain John H. Woolfolk, your secretary; Ensign Levi Wells, of the 7th United States' infantry; and a number of privates, whom I find, by subsequent information, have been massacred.

"The memory of past services rendered me by captain Hart's family made me particularly anxious to ascertain his fate. I flattered myself he was alive, and every information I could get for some time flattered my hopes. But one of the last prisoners who was brought in, told me that the captain was certainly massacred. He was so badly wounded as to prevent him from walking. The Indians took him some distance on a horse, but at length took him off and tomahawked him.

"About the 10th instant, an Indian brought Captain M'Crackin's commission to Sandwich; the paper was bloody. The fellow said he took the captain unhurt, but some time after, when stripping and examining him, he found an Indian scalp in his bosom, which induced him to kill him. This, you cannot but be assured, is a humbug of the fellow's own making, to screen himself from the odium of barbarity. The captain's character, and the danger that attended his carrying such furniture in a disastrous battle, give it the lie.

"Captain Woolfolk, after having been wounded in two places, by some means had got refuge in one of the French houses on the Raisin. He was discovered next day, and dragged from his asylum. He was taken to the house of a Mr. Lasselle, where he said he would give one thousand dollars to any one who would purchase him. Mr. Lasselle said it was out of his power, but he had no doubt his brother would do it, who lived at hand. He directed his owners to the house of his brother, but as they were on their way, an Indian from a waste house shot him through the head.

"Ensign Wells was taken by my side unhurt. I considered him as alive, until, on my arrival at this place, Captain Nags tells me he was killed by a Pottawatamy Indian, not long after he was taken.

"Many fresh scalps have been brought in since the battle, and dead bodies seen through the country, which prove that others have been killed, whose names I have not been able to find out, independent of those reported to Colonel Proctor.

"This, sir, is all the information I have been able to collect, concerning those who were massacred. The fifteen or eighteen, mentioned in the remarks to the return made to Colonel Proctor, whose names do not appear, were not known by those who saw them killed.

"Major Graves, of the 5th regiment of Kentucky volunteers, I have been able to get no information of, further than that he was brought to the river Rouge, on the 25th or 26th of January, in a sleigh. I fear, from our having heard nothing of him since, that he is no more, and that valuable officer forever lost to his country.

"The dead of our army are still denied the rites of sepulture. At the time I left Sandwich, I was told the hogs were eating them. A gentleman told me he had seen them running about with skulls, arms, legs, and other parts of the human system in their mouths. The French people on the Raisin buried Captains Hart, Woolfolk, and some others, but it was more than their lives were worth to have been caught paying this last customary tribute to mortality.

"I several times agitated the subject of burying the dead, when in company with the British officers, but they always answered, that the Indians would not suffer it."

Colonel H. PROCTOR.

Extract of a letter from Major General Harrison to the Secretary of War, dated at the Miami Rapids, February 11, 1813.

"I have the honor to enclose to you the deposition of Medard Labbardie, who was at the river Raisin on the 22d ultimo, and remained there till the 6th instant. His account of the loss of the enemy in the action is corroborated by several others, nor is there the least reason to doubt his statement, as it regards the horrible fate of our wounded men. There is another circumstance which plainly shows that the British have no intention to conduct the war (at least in this quarter) upon those principles which have been held sacred by all civilized nations. On the 30th ultimo, I despatched Doctor M'Keehan, a surgeon's mate in the militia, with a flag, to ascertain the situation of our wounded. He was attended by one of our militiamen and a Frenchman. On the night after their departure, they halted near this place for the purpose of taking a few hours' sleep, in a vacant cabin upon the bank of the river. The carryall in which they travelled was left at the door with the flag set up in it. They were discovered by a party of Indians (accompanied, it is said, by a British officer) and attacked in the manner described in the deposition. The militiaman was killed and scalped, the Doctor and the Frenchman taken. Doctor M'Keehan was furnished with a letter, addressed to any British officer whom he might meet, describing the character in which he went, and the object for which he was sent, an open letter to General Winchester, and written instructions to himself, all of which he was directed to show to the first officer he met with. He was also supplied with one hundred dollars in gold, to procure necessaries for the prisoners."

The affidavit of Medard Labbardie, late resident near the river Raisin, in the Michigan territory.

He being sworn, saith, he was in his house when he heard the guns at the commencement of the action at the river Raisin, on the 22d January, 1813, between the American forces under General Winchester, and the British, Canadian, and Indian forces, said to be commanded by Col. St. George. After some little time, he heard that the Indians were killing the inhabitants as well as the Americans, upon which he went towards the scene of action, in order to save his family. As he went on, he was, with one other inhabitant, taken prisoner by two Wyandot Indians, and carried prisoner to the Indian lines, from which he saw great part of the action. The right wing of the Americans had given way before he got a sight of the action. It terminated after the sun was some hours high, not far from 11 o'clock, A. M. by the surrender of the American forces that then remained on the ground. He saw the flag hoisted by the British sent to the American forces, and saw it pass three times to the Americans before the surrender. He could not understand English, but understood that General Winchester was taken prisoner before he got to the lines of his own men; that he was compelled to carry the flag to his own forces after he was taken; that he understood the reason of the flag passing so often, was, that the Americans refused to surrender upon any other terms than that the wounded should be taken care of, the dead buried, and the inhabitants protected in their property. That the British first refused to agree to these terms, but finally did agree to them. He also understood that the loss of the British and Indians in the action was about four hundred killed. He also understood that the loss of the Americans in the action was about one hundred and eighty killed.

He knows that, on the day of the action, all the prisoners who were able to march, were marched off towards Malden, the wounded, about sixty or eighty in number, left in two houses, without any of their friends, or a physician, to take care of them, and without any British officer or men. About ten Indians remained behind upon the ground; the balance of the Indians went off with the British, and he was told by some of the Canadian militia, that the British had promised the Indians a frolic that night, at Stony creek, about six miles from the river Raisin.

He was liberated after the line of march was formed for Malden. The next morning he was in the houses where the wounded were. That morning about fifty Indians returned; they brought whiskey with them; they drank some, and gave some to the Indians there, and between 9 and 10 o'clock A. M. commenced killing the wounded, then set fire to the houses the wounded were in, and consumed them. He was at his father's, on this side of Detroit river, about seven days after the action, and saw across the river the prisoners marched off for Niagara, from Malden.

He saith that he saw taken by his house, by Captain Elliott, and nine Wyandot Indians, two men that he understood had been sent by General Harrison with a flag to the British. One of the men, (Mr. Tessier) he knew, the other he did not know, but understood he was a doctor. He had not an opportunity of conversing with them, but understood from an inhabitant, to whom Mr. Tessier communicated it, that they stopped for the night and left the flag hoisted on the carryall; that the flag was taken away unknown to them, and that the Indians fired on them; that he, Tessier, told them they were Frenchmen, and surrendered, upon which the Indians ceased firing, and took them. They then mentioned they were sent with a flag. The Indians said they were liars, and took them off.

Mr. Tessier was set at liberty at the river Raisin, and remained two days expecting the doctor to return; at the end of which time, Tessier was sent for by the British, and taken to Malden. He understood that the doctor was sent off immediately to Niagara; the doctor was wounded in the ankle. He understood the British charged the doctor and Tessier with being spies. And further he saith not.

MEDARD LABBARDIE.

SIR:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, respecting a man named O'Neale, taken by the detachment from the squadron under the orders of Rear Admiral Cockburn. This man has been released upon the application of the magistrates of Havre de Grace, on parole.

I was not informed of this man being an Irishman, or he would certainly have been detained, to account to his sovereign and country for being in arms against the British colors.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN.

Brigadier General MILLER, commanding the United States' forces, &c. Baltimore.

NICHOLASVILLE, Kentucky, April 24th, 1813.

SIR:

Yours of the 5th instant, requesting me to give you a statement respecting the late disaster at Frenchtown, was duly received. Rest assured, sir, that it is with sensations the most unpleasant that I undertake to recount the infamous and barbarous conduct of the British and Indians after the battle of the 23d January. The blood runs cold in my veins when I think of it.

On the morning of the 23d, shortly after light, six or eight Indians came to the house of Jean Baptiste Jereau, where I was, in company with Major Graves, Captains Hart and Hickman, Doctor Todd, and fifteen or twenty private volunteers, belonging to different corps. They did not molest any person or thing on their first approach, but kept sauntering about until there were a large number collected, (say one or two hundred) at which time they commenced plundering the houses of the inhabitants, and the massacre of the wounded prisoners. I was one amongst the first that was taken prisoner, and was taken to a horse about twenty paces from the house, after being divested of part of my clothing, and commanded by signs there to remain for further orders. Shortly after being there, I saw them knock down Captain Hickman at the door, together with several others with whom I was not acquainted. Supposing a general massacre had commenced, I made an effort to get to a house about one hundred yards distant, which contained a number of wounded, but, on my reaching the house, to my great mortification, found it surrounded by Indians, which precluded the possibility of my giving notice to the unfortunate victims of savage barbarity. An Indian chief of the Tawa tribe, by the name of M'Carty, gave me possession of his horse and blanket, telling me, by signs, to lead the horse to the house which I had just before left. The Indian that first took me, by this time came up and manifested a hostile disposition towards me, by raising his tomahawk as if to give me the fatal blow, which was prevented by my very good friend M'Carty. On my reaching the house which I had first started from, I saw the Indians take off several prisoners, which I afterwards saw in the road, in a most mangled condition, and entirely stripped of their clothing.

Messrs. Bradford, Searls, Turner, and Blythe, were collected around a carryall, which contained articles taken by the Indians from the citizens. We had all been placed there, by our respective captors, except Blythe, who came where we were, entreating an Indian to convey him to Malden, promising to give him forty or fifty dollars, and whilst in the act of pleading for mercy, an Indian, more savage than the other, stepped up behind, tomahawked, stripped, and scalped him. The next that attracted my attention, was the houses on fire that contained several wounded, whom I knew were not able to get out. After the houses were nearly consumed, we received marching orders, and after arriving at Sandy creek, the Indians called a halt, and commenced cooking; after preparing and eating a little sweetened gruel, Messrs. Bradford, Searls, Turner, and myself, received some, and were eating, when an Indian came up and proposed exchanging his moccasins for Mr. Searls' shoes, which he readily complied with. They then exchanged hats, after which the Indian inquired how many men Harrison had with him, and, at the same time, calling Searls a Washington or Madison, then raised his tomahawk and struck him on the shoulder, which cut into the cavity of the body. Searls then caught hold of the tomahawk and appeared to resist, and upon my telling him that his fate was inevitable, he closed his eyes and received the savage blow which terminated his existence. I was near enough to him to receive the brains and blood, after the fatal blow, on my blanket. A short time after the death of Searls, I saw three others share a similar fate. We then set out for Brownstown, which place we reached about 12 or 1 o'clock at night. After being exposed to several hours incessant rain in reaching that place, we were put into the council house, the floor of which was partly covered with water, at which place we remained until next morning, when we again received marching orders for their village on the river Rouge, which place we made that day, where I was kept six days, then taken to Detroit and sold. For a more detailed account of the proceedings, I take the liberty of referring you to a publication which appeared in the public prints, signed by Ensign J. L. Baker, and to the publication of Judge Woodward, both of which I have particularly examined, and find them to be literally correct, so far as came under my notice.

I am, sir, with due regard, your fellow-citizen,

GUSTAVUS M. BOWER,

Surgeon's Mate 5th regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

JESSE BLEDSOE, Esq. Lexington.

JESSAMINE COUNTY, to wit:

This day Gustavus M. Bower personally came before me, John Metcalf, one of the Commonwealths' justices of the peace, in and for said county, and made oath to the truth of assertions before stated by the said Bower. Given under my hand this 24th day of April, 1813.

JOHN METCALF:

LEXINGTON, May 2d, 1813.

SIR:

I received your letter some time since, relative to the disastrous affair of Frenchtown, of 22d and 23d January last. For the particulars of the action, and the terms of capitulation, I refer you to the official report of General Winchester, which is correct as far as came within my knowledge. After the capitulation, I was introduced to Colonel Proctor, the commander of the British forces and Indians, as one of the surviving surgeons, and by him was requested to attend to our wounded who were left on the ground where the action was fought. I willingly acquiesced, and Doctor Bowers, my mate, remained with me; at the same time I informed Colonel Proctor of my apprehensions for the safety of the wounded and the surgeons; he replied, "be under no apprehensions, you will be perfectly safe, I will place you under the special care of the chiefs until morning, and very early I will send conveyances for the wounded and yourself to Amherstburg." Shortly after, I was requested to ascertain the number and rank of the wounded, and in so doing was assisted by a British officer, (whose name I did not know) to whom I likewise communicated my apprehensions of safety; he manifested some irritation at my doubts of British honor and magnanimity, and assured me protection would be afforded me. While engaged in this business, one of the rooms occupied by the wounded was crowded with Indians who were peaceable, but one of them, who could speak English, admonished the British officer of the propriety of stationing interpreters in the houses. Upon my return from this business to the room I occupied, and which was set apart for the wounded officers, I met, and was made acquainted with Captain Elliott, at present a British officer, who had visited Captain Hart, then wounded. Captain Hart was solicitous to be removed that evening, and Captain Elliott replied, if it was possible (and every exertion should be made) he should, and if it could not be effected that evening, early in the morning he would call for him in his own train (sleigh) and convey him to his own house in Amherstburg, where he should remain until recovered, assuring him repeatedly, no danger was to be apprehended, and, if possible, he would remain with him that night. In the afternoon Captain Elliott and every British officer left the encampment, leaving behind three interpreters. From the repeated assurances, my apprehensions were quiet: for who could doubt? About one hour before daylight (for my duties required my attention nearly all the night) the interpreters suddenly disappeared. About an hour after day light, the Indians began to collect in the town, and commenced plundering the houses in which the wounded were placed, and then stripped them and myself of our clothing. At this time the room I had occupied was so crowded with Indians, and Captain Hart's wound, already painful, being injured by them, I conveyed him to an adjoining house which had been plundered and was empty, where I met the Indian, (who, on the preceding day, had requested that interpreters should be left) and he knew my rank. He inquired why the surgeons were left, and why the wounded were left? I replied, it was the wish of Colonel Proctor we should remain until he could send for us; and Captain Hart informed him Captain Elliott, was a friend of his, and was to call for him that morning. He shook his head significantly, and replied they were damned rascals, or we would have been taken off the preceding day. The Indian informed me every individual would be killed, and requested me to be quiet, for the chiefs were then in council, and "may be" only the wounded would be killed. Captain Hart offered him $100 to take him to Malden. He replied, you are too badly wounded. While we were conversing, one of the wounded was tomahawked at our feet. Shortly after, the Indian returned and told me I was a prisoner, and must go. I was taken by the Indian to the house I had left, and there discovered that Captain Hickman and two others had, in my absence, been tomahawked, scalped, and stripped. I was tied and taken by this Indian towards Malden, about four miles, when I came to the encampment of the British wounded, and met with Captain Elliott and the surgeon of the 41st regiment. Captain Elliott immediately recognised me, and inquired the cause of my situation. I informed him what had taken place, and requested him to send back immediately; that some who were badly wounded might be still alive, and could be saved, and particularly named Captain Hart, for whom he manifested much friendship. Captain Elliott replied, it is now too late; you may rest assured that those who are once taken by the Indians are safe, and will be taken to Malden, and those who are badly wounded are killed ere this. I replied, many are unable to walk, and some will be killed after making an effort, and walking several miles, who might be saved; to which he replied, charity begins at home; my own wounded are to be conveyed first, and if any sleighs remain, they shall be sent back for your wounded. My anxiety to get some person to return, in hopes of saving some of the prisoners, induced me at length to make an appeal to their avarice. The surgical instruments of the detachment were left in the room I occupied, and I informed the surgeon of their value and importance at that time; he immediately despatched an interpreter for them, who returned with the information they were destroyed in the burning of the house, and gave additional confirmation of the massacre of the wounded. I was released from the Indians by Captain Elliott and the surgeon. At this time my brother, who was wounded, and several others, were in possession of the Indians, who were taking them towards Malden. I requested their release, and permission for them to accompany me on foot, under British protection. Captain Elliott told me it was impossible, and to be under no fears, they were safe: for he knew the fidelity of the Indians with whom they were. When the intelligence of the massacre was by me communicated to Captain Elliott and the surgeon, they appeared much exasperated, and declared it was impossible to restrain the savages. The cause he then assigned to me was, that when the Indians discovered their loss in killed and wounded, and that of the British, they started off towards our wounded, declaring they would have satisfaction, and, he continued, I was fearful of the event. During the plunder and the massacre, our wounded conducted themselves with the utmost composure and resignation, and made no resistance, which they knew would be fruitless, and destruction to all.

It was asserted by Colonel Proctor, in a conversation at Amherstburg, that the Indians had got some whiskey in the house where we were stationed, and had become intoxicated: That the Indians may have had some whiskey, I shall not deny; but I think I can safely say, that they did not procure it there, and that was not the cause of the massacre: for, on the preceding days, and subsequent to the action of the 18th, I wanted some spirits, and made application to the housekeeper, who assured me there was none about the house, for it was all consumed by the British and Indians, who had quartered in the house prior to the action of the 18th; besides, the Indians showed no manifestation of drunkenness; their deliberate pilfering, and their orderly conduct throughout, was not such as would be expected from drunken Indians.

Upon my arrival at Malden, I was again solicited to take charge of the wounded; the surgery was opened to me, and I had the use of the medicines and dressings necessary, and they had as comfortable rooms as could be procured. During our stay in Malden, some eight or ten of the wounded were brought in by the Indians; several made their escape who were doomed to massacre, and found protection with the inhabitants of the territory, who brought them into Malden; and several made their escape, wandered in and delivered themselves up at the fort. Prior to our leaving Malden, one poor fellow was brought in scalped alive by the Indians, and delivered up to the British; but before I reached him, death put an end to his sufferings. I frequently, and on every occasion, urged the British officers to exert themselves and procure the release of the wounded from the Indians, urging the necessity of having their wounds dressed. In a conversation on this subject with Captain Elliott, and while urging it, he replied, the Indians are excellent surgeons. The prisoners were all marched off to Sandwich, after remaining a few days at Malden, and I was called upon to know how many from their wounds were unable to march, who had sleighs furnished them, which was the case during the march to Fort George. Before I conclude, I must say, that the terms of capitulation were violated in every particular by the enemy. The wounded were not protected; private property was not held sacred; and our side arms were not restored. With a few exceptions, I was treated respectfully by the British officers, save the abuse which was lavished on my Government, and that was by no means sparingly bestowed.

I am, respectfully, yours, &c.

JOHN TODD, M. D.

Late Surgeon to the 5th Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Militia.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, } ss.
Fayette County,

This day, Doctor John Todd came before me, John H. Morton, a justice of the peace for said county, and made oath that the facts stated in the foregoing letter are substantially true to the best of his knowledge.

Given under my hand, this 3d day of May, 1813.

JOHN H. MORTON.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, }
Pendleton County, in the Town of Falmouth. }

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, John Dawson, an orderly sergeant in Captain Glave's company of the first regiment Kentucky volunteer militia, being detailed off, and attached to Captain Wriel Seabrees' company, and was in the battle of the 18th of January, and did not receive a wound, but on the 22d, about 9 o'clock, received a shot under the right arm, which lodged between the ribs. After the capitulation of our troops, there came a paymaster of the British army in the house where I was, to take the number of wounded that was in the house. I asked what was to be done with us; he replied, "don't make yourself uneasy about that, you shall be protected this night by a strong guard which shall be left with you." But to my sad misfortune, I found there were but three interpreters left, and in the night an officer took two of them away, and in the morning the other one said he could not talk Indian. So when the Indians came in the morning, they broke open the doors of the houses, began to tomahawk, scalp and plunder; then set fire to the houses which contained the prisoners; with this I got up, put on my great coat, put up my knapsack, and went out of doors. I had not been out more than one minute before an Indian came up to me and took the coat off my back; also another Indian told me to put my knapsack in his sled. I did so. At this time Major Graves and Captain Hart were out in the yard. I heard Captain Hart make a bargain with an Indian to take him to Malden, which the Indian agreed so to do, for the sum of one hundred dollars. I saw the Indian put a pair of socks on Hart, and put him on a horse; this was the last I saw of Hart. I then saw a man riding, whom I thought was a British officer. I made to him, but found that he was an Indian who was aid-de-camp to General Roundhead; he had with him, when I came up, twelve men. It was at the mouth of a lane where I overtook him, where there were two Indians scalping two men; he halloed to them to give way; they did so. After this, we went on; and on Sandy creek, about three miles from the battle ground, I saw Major Graves in an Indian sleigh; this is the last account of him that I could ascertain. We went on that night to Brownstown, and in the morning of the 24th a man gave out walking, with the rheumatic pains, who was by the name of Downey. The Indians tomahawked him, and then stripped him. We then marched on above Detroit, on the river Rouge. I staid with them seven days. They then took me into Detroit, (leaving a young man in the camp by the name of John Davenport) and sold me to Major Muir, who commands Fort Detroit. I then was sent over to Sandwich, there I staid until the 8th of February; they marched me to Fort George, and — me on the 19th of February, 1813. The above is a true statement as far as I saw; though I saw numbers massacred that I did not know.

During my confinement with the Indians, whilst at their camps, they showed more humanity than the British. Given under my hand, this 21st day of April, 1813.

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Thomas Pollard, a private of Captain Glave's company, of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, was in battles, fought with the British and Indian army on the 18th and 22d of January last, at the river Raisin, and after the surrender of our army as prisoners of war on the 22d, upon the assurances of the British officers promising protection to my wounded fellow soldiers, and that they would send carryalls for them the next day. Although I had received no injury in either of the actions, fought on the 18th and 22d, I voluntarily staid to assist and comfort my messmates, John Dawson, Albert Ammerman, and Jesse Green, all of whom had received wounds by balls.

I have first examined the statement made and sworn to by John Dawson, hereto annexed, and witnessed every circumstance therein stated to be truly stated, within my own knowledge. The Indian who bargained with Captain Hart to take him to Fort Malden for one hundred dollars, and took charge of him, put him on a horse and started on his way; spoke good enough the English tongue for us to understand the contract.

THOMAS POLLARD.

PENDLETON COUNTY, ss.

I, William Mountjoy, one of the Commonwealths' justices of the peace for the State of Kentucky, in and for said county, do certify that the foregoing certificate of Thomas Pollard was subscribed and sworn to before me. Given under my hand, this 21st April, 1813.

WM. MOUNTJOY.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, }

On the 21st day of April, 1813, I, Albert Ammerman, a private of Captain Glave's company of the first regiment of Kentucky volunteer militia, being wounded in the battle of the 18th January last, at the river Raisin, by a ball in the flesh of the thigh; and from the window of the house which was appropriated for an hospital, was a witness to the battle of the 22d of the same month; and after the surrender, I being but slightly wounded, proposed marching with the rest of the prisoners; and was prevented by the order of a British officer, who said that a guard would be left to take care of the wounded, and carryalls would be sent for them to ride into Malden on the next morning. But to my astonishment no guard was left, and about sunrise on the morning of the 23d, a party of Indians returned to the hospital, and the first Indian that came to the room I was lodged in, could speak the English language. He was asked by one of the wounded what was to be done with the wounded. He replied they were all to be killed that could not walk; and shortly after a general massacre commenced. I instantly put on my knapsack and went out of the house; my knapsack was demanded by an Indian at the door, to whom I gave it. He conducted me to a log some little distance from the house, on which I sat down, where I witnessed the butchery of many of my fellow-citizens, sufferers by the tomahawk and scalping knife, and to finish the scene, set fire to the houses occupied by the wounded prisoners; many of them, struggling in the arms of death, put their heads out of the windows whilst enveloped in smoke and flames. After this bloody work was finished, I was marched off on the direction towards Brownstown, by an Indian, and when about half a mile from Frenchtown on our way, was overtaken by two Indians who had Captain Hart in custody, mounted on a horse. As they approached nearly to us, I noticed they were speaking loud and animated as if in a quarrel, but not understanding their language, did not understand what passed between them, but think it is probable that the quarrel was occasioned respecting one hundred dollars which I understood Captain Hart had given to one of the Indians aforesaid, to convey him to Fort Malden. The quarrel appeared to grow very warm, so much so that the Indians took aim at each other with their guns; and, as if to settle the dispute, it appeared to me as if they had mutually agreed to kill Captain Hart, and plunder him of the rest of his money and effects, which they did, by taking him off his horse, then knocked him down with a war club, scalped and tomahawked him, and stripped him naked, leaving his body on the ground. I was gratified in observing that during this scene of trial, Captain Hart refrained from supplication or entreaty, but appeared perfectly calm and collected. He met his fate with that firmness which was his particular characteristic. No other prisoner of our army of the United States was present to witness this melancholy scene, the death of Captain Hart. During my captivity with the Indians, five days only, I was treated with more hospitality than I had any reason to expect; much more so than I experienced from the British, after I was ransomed at Detroit, by Mr. Benjamin Chittenden, who will ever be entitled to my utmost gratitude; by him I was humanely treated, and also by some of the French Canadians.

ALBERT AMMERMAN, (his + mark.)

PENDLETON COUNTY, ss.

I, William Mountjoy, one of the Commonwealths' justices of the peace for the State of Kentucky, in and for said county, do certify, that the foregoing certificate of Albert Ammerman was subscribed and sworn to before me. Given under my hand, this 21st day of April, 1813.

WM. MOUNTJOY.

LEXINGTON, April 13th, 1813.

SIR: You request of me a statement of facts within my own knowledge, concerning the murder of our men after the battle and surrender at Frenchtown.

I was one of those who was taken by the Indians on the retreat, about one and a half miles from where the action first commenced. Just before we were taken, with the assistance of Lieutenant Chinn, belonging to the militia, I formed between fifteen and twenty men; I then discovered the Indians running upon us on each side and in front, about sixty in number, with their arms at a trail. I discovered there was no chance to repel them. I ordered the men to ground their arms, which was done: the Indians then came up and secured the arms of our men, and shot them, including the Lieutenant before mentioned. I was the only one saved. I was taken and delivered up to Captain Elliott, a British officer.

As to the murder of the wounded, I know nothing of my own knowledge.

Your obedient servant,

A. GARRETT.

HON. JESSE BLEDSOE.

FAYETTE COUNTY, SS.

This day, Lieutenant Ashton Garrett, of the 17th regiment U. S. infantry, came before me, and made oath, that the foregoing statement is just and true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

Given under my hand, this 13th day of April, 1813.

JOHN H. MORTON, J. P.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, FAYETTE COUNTY, SS.

Personally appeared before me, a justice of the peace for the county aforesaid, Charles Bradford, an inhabitant of the town of Lexington, State of Kentucky, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists, deposed and saith, that he was in the actions at the river Raisin, on the 18th and 22d January last; that he was wounded in the right hip, and remained at Frenchtown after the capitulation; that, on the 22d, before the prisoners (who were able to walk) were marched for Malden, he saw Captain William Elliott, with whom he had been formerly acquainted, and of whom he inquired, personally, what would be done with the wounded prisoners? whether they would be taken to Malden that evening with the other prisoners, or not? He said they would not be taken to Malden that evening, but a strong guard would be left to protect them against any outrage the Indians might be disposed to commit. Elliott had a similar conversation with Major Graves, Captains Hart and Hickman, and Doctors Todd and Bowers, in the presence of this deponent. He, Elliott, further stated that sleighs would be sent to convey the wounded to Malden the next morning. This deponent further says, that the British marched away; no guard was left to protect the wounded; and that Captain Elliott, when asked the reason, observed that some interpreters were left, whose influence among the Indians was greater, and that they were better able to protect us than a guard. About two or three o'clock in the morning of the 23d January, this deponent discovered that the interpreters had left the house in which he was, and he never saw them afterwards; that between day-light and sun rise, on the 23d, he saw a large number of Indians come to the house; they burst open the door, and in a few minutes commenced plundering the prisoners, and tomahawking those who were unable to walk. This deponent left the house as soon as possible, and went into the yard, where a number of his fellow-prisoners had assembled. He was there claimed as a prisoner by an Indian, who gave him some articles to hold whilst he plundered more. At this time he was standing with Doctor Bowers and James E. Blythe, when an Indian, without any provocation, tomahawked Blythe, and scalped him. Shortly after, they (the Indians) set fire to the houses in which the wounded had been quartered, and burnt them down, with the bodies of those whom they had murdered. This deponent was then taken by the Indians, in company with Doctor Bowers, Charles Searls, Julius Turner, and several others, to Sandy creek; that on the way he saw a number of the prisoners who had been tomahawked; that, whilst at Sandy creek, they murdered Charles Searls, Thomas S. Crow, and three or four others. That this deponent was then packed with forty or fifty pounds weight, and taken to the river Rouge, where the Indians had encamped: that, whilst he was there, he inquired of an Indian whether he would take him to Malden, as he wished to be given to Captain Elliott. The Indian said, if Captain Elliott told him to do so he would, as they always did as he requested them. This deponent was six days with the Indians before they took him to Detroit, where he was purchased by Stephen Mack and Oliver W. Miller, for eighty dollars. That the British officer commanding at Detroit (Major Muir) again claimed him as a British prisoner, notwithstanding his having just been ransomed from their allies, (by his own countrymen) and sent him to Sandwich, where he remained until the 9th or 10th February, when he was sent to Fort George, and there paroled. This deponent states, that, whilst a prisoner at Sandwich, he was several times treated insultingly by the British officers, and by one John M'Gregor; that the citizens, generally, treated the prisoners with kindness and attention, as far as was in their power.

This being the first opportunity the deponent has had of expressing his gratitude to the American citizens who treated the prisoners with so much friendship and humanity at Detroit, cannot refrain from so doing. And, as long as he lives, the names of Messrs. Mack, Miller, Smart, Woodward, Williams, M'Donald, Hunt, Mays, &c. shall never be forgotten.

Sworn and subscribed to before me, this 29th day of April, 1813.

SIR: I have the honor to present you, by the hands of Lieutenant Dudley, the British standard taken at York on the 27th of April last, accompanied by the mace over which was hung a human scalp.

These articles were taken from the parliament house by one of my officers, and presented to me. The scalp I caused to be presented to General Dearborn, who, I believe, still has it in his possession. I also send, by the same gentleman, one of the British flags taken at Fort George on the 27th of May.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

OUTRAGES AT HAMPTON, IN VIRGINIA.

Extract of a letter from General Taylor to Admiral Warren, dated

HEAD QUARTERS, NORFOLK, June 29, 1813.

"I have heard with grief and astonishment of the excesses, both to property and persons, committed by the laid troops who took possession of Hampton. The respect I entertain for your personal character leads me to make known these excesses. It would not become me to suggest what course of inquiry and punishment is due to the honor of your arms. But the world will suppose those acts to have been approved, if not excited, which are passed over with impunity. I do not, however, deprecate any measures you may think necessary or proper, but am prepared for any species of warfare which you may be disposed to prosecute. It is for the sake of humanity I enter this protest.

"We are, in this part of the country, merely in the noviciate of our warfare. The character it will hereafter assume, whether of mildness or ferocity, will materially depend on the first operations of our arms, and on the personal character and dispositions of the respective commanders.

"For myself, I assure you most solemnly, that I neither have authorized, nor will sanction, any outrage on humanity or the laws of civilized warfare. On the contrary, I think it due, no less to my personal honor than to that of my country, to repress and punish every excess. I hope that these sentiments will be reciprocated. It will depend on you whether the evils inseparable from a state of war shall, in our operations, be tempered by the mildness of civilized life, or, under your authority, be aggravated by all the fiend-like passions which can be instilled into them."

H. B. M. SHIP SAN DOMINGO, Hampton Roads, Chesapeake, June 29, 1813.

SIR:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day, stating that you had communicated to your Government the proposal of an exchange of prisoners, and, also, that some excesses had been committed by the troops in the late affair at Hampton. I have communicated to my friend, Sir Sidney Beckwith, the commander of his Majesty's forces on shore, this part of your letter, and he will have the honor of writing to you upon the points to which it alludes.

I beg leave to assure you that it is my wish to alleviate the misfortunes of the war commenced against my country, by every means in my power; at the same time, I am prepared to meet any result that may ensue between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient faithful humble servant,

JOHN BORLASE WARREN,
Admiral of the Blue, and Commander in Chief.

SIR:

Admiral Sir John B. Warren having communicated to me the contents of your letter, I lose no time in assuring you that your wish cannot exceed mine to carry on war with every attention to the unfortunate individuals in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place. In this spirit, I shall vie with you to the utmost. At the same time, I ought to state to you that the excesses of which you complain at Hampton were occasioned by a proceeding of so extraordinary a nature, that, if I had not been an eye-witness, I could not have credited it. At the recent attempt on Craney Island, the troops in a barge sunk by the fire of your guns, clung to the wreck of the boat. Several Americans, I assure you most solemnly, waded off from the island, and, in presence of all engaged, fired upon and shot these poor fellows. With a feeling natural to such a proceeding, the men of that corps landed at Hampton.

That occurrences of that kind may never occur again, and that the troops of each nation may be guided by sentiments of honor and humanity, is the earnest wish of, sir, your very obedient servant,

SIDNEY BECKWITH, Q. M. Gen.

To Brig. Gen. TAYLOR, Commanding the United States' Troops, Norfolk.

JAMES MAURICE, Major, Acting A. A. G.

HEAD QUARTERS, NORFOLK, July 1, 1813.

SIR:

It affords me the highest satisfaction to receive your assurance that you wish "to carry on war with every attention to the unfortunate individuals in whose immediate vicinity military operations may take place." Such sentiments can alone give splendor to courage, and confer honor on military skill. Worthless is the laurel steeped in female tears, and joyless the conquests which have inflicted needless woe on the peaceful and unresisting. The frankness with which you admit the excesses at Hampton is a guarantee against the repetition.

I cannot doubt, sir, your conviction that the scene described by you at Craney Island was really acted. But the very reason it appeared to you incredible and inhuman, it should have been unauthorized. Your own perception of propriety shall decide, if facts should not have been ascertained, and redress demanded, before retaliation was resorted to—a retaliation, too, extravagant in its measure, applying not to the perpetrators of the alleged offence, or their comrades, but to the innocent and helpless. I have reason to think that you are mistaken in your impressions of the conduct of our troops at Craney Island. That they waded into the water on the sinking of your boat is true; but I learn that it was for the purpose of securing their conquest, and assisting the perishing. One person, perhaps more, was shot, but it was only for a continued effort to escape, after repeated offers of safety on surrender, (such at least is the representation made to me.) If, however, your yielding troops have been butchered, it is due to the honor of our arms to disclaim and punish the enormity. The fame of my country shall never be tarnished by such conduct in the troops under my command. I have to-day ordered an inquiry into the facts, by a board of field officers. Proper measures shall be taken to punish whatsoever of impropriety may have been committed. I flatter myself you will perceive in these measures a disposition to afford no cause of reproach in any future conflict. When we meet, let us combat as soldiers, jealous of the honor of our respective countries, anxious to surpass each other as well in magnanimity as in courage.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my consideration and respect.

A copy.

JOHN MYERS, Aid-de-Camp.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Taylor to the Secretary of War, dated

NORFOLK, 2d July, 1813.

I enclose, as was promised yesterday, copies of the letters written to Admiral Warren and General Beckwith. My aid, who carried them down, yesterday, brought back a letter from Admiral Warren, of which a copy is enclosed, and has made a statement of what occurred in his conference with the General.

The letter of the Admiral, though polite, is certainly not responsive to any thing which has occurred, and the conversation with the General, though equally civil, is obviously designed to prevent any further discussion of the subject. From the report of prisoners and deserters, there is too much reason to believe that, before the attack on Craney Island, the cupidity of the troops had been excited by a promise of the pillage of Norfolk. To inflame their resentment, after their failure, and to keep alive the hope of plunder at Norfolk, there is much reason to fear that our troops have unmeritedly been charged with misconduct at Craney Island, and that made a pretext for their excesses and their conduct at Hampton. I entertain no doubt of the justification of the honor and magnanimity of our men, by the reports of the board of officers. I do not mean that the subject shall drop, but when I communicate the report, I shall leave the British commander the alternative, either of adopting similar measures in his own army, or remaining under the imputation of having excited their troops to commit these excesses. Our troops are highly inflamed.

Notes for Captain Myers in his interview with Admiral Warren.

A defenceless and unresisting town has been given up to indiscriminate pillage, though civilized war tolerates this only as to fortified places, carried by assault, and after summons.

Individuals have been stripped naked; a sick man stabbed twice in the hospital; a sick man shot, at Pembroke, in his bed, and in the arms of his wife, long after the defeat of the troops; his wife also shot at, and wounded—a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby.

Females have been not only assaulted, and personally abused and struck, but even violated.

If occasion offers, notice may be immediately made of the information, given by prisoners and deserters, of the promise to plunder Norfolk.

As to the imputation of our troops at Craney Island, if Admiral Warren should mention it, deny the fact, and state the actual conduct of our troops, in going into the water to assist their men, and then giving them refreshments as soon as they entered the fort. Refer to the conduct of all our prisoners, particularly those taken from the boats of the Victorians.

JOHN MYERS, Captain and Aid-de-camp.

HEAD QUARTERS, NORFOLK, July 2d, 1813.

SIR:

In obedience to your orders I proceeded, yesterday, with a flag of truce, to Admiral Warren, in Hampton Roads, to whom I handed both the despatch for himself and that for Sir Sidney Beckwith. The Admiral received me with civility, and with many acknowledgments for the terms of your letter. Sir Sidney was on shore at Old Point Comfort. Feeling some difficulty about the propriety of delaying or board for his arrival, I was about to depart, but Admiral Warren expressed a wish that I would remain, saying that he would desire, no doubt, to give a reply.

Sir Sidney did not arrive till 8 o'clock. He expressed great respect for the motives that had actuated you, sir, in the measures which you were pursuing. They were more than he desired. It was sufficient, he said, if your own mind was satisfied. He expressed regret at the trouble you had taken, and much deference for your character, with a resolution to vie with you in efforts to confine future operations within the bounds of humanity, and the usages of war. He said, in allusion to the pretended conduct of our men at Craney Island, that it proceeded no doubt from a few of the more disorderly. I denied the charge altogether, as I had done in my previous interview, when it was made the justification of their outrages at Hampton, on the ground of retaliation.

I found that it was not his intention to give to your despatch a written reply. By the light manner in which he glanced at the subject of your investigation, I could perceive that it was pressed further than was desirable to him. It was my wish, however, to be able to report to you the probability of a like course of inquiry on his part, and I enumerated the catalogue of abuses and violence at Hampton. I mentioned the pillage of the town, and the wanton destruction of medicines; that individuals had been stripped naked; a sick man stabbed twice, who was in the hospital; a sick man shot in his bed, at Pembroke, and in the arms of his wife, who was also shot at, and wounded, long after the defeat of the troops—a Mr. and Mrs. Kirby; and finally, the assault on females, their being struck, and personally abused, and even violated.

At the mention of the murder of Kirby, and the wound given to his wife, Sir Sidney distinctly admitted it; the others he appeared not to be acquainted with the particulars of, and expressed some concern at it. He said that he had, however, on coming to a knowledge of their conduct, immediately ordered the embarkation of the troops that were concerned, with a determination that they should not again land; and that, while he was unable to control a past event, the responsibility of a recurrence should rest on himself; that the troops under his command were strangers to him, on his arrival here, and appealing to my knowledge of the nature of the war in Spain, in which these men (meaning the French corps) he said had been trained, told me they could not be restrained.

Thus far he thought he could not give a more convincing proof of the sincerity of his professions, than in the withdrawal of these troops, and that he had, moreover, just been employed in finding a new watering place on Back river, in order to remove from Hampton, and to quiet the minds of the inhabitants.

He assured me that in making such a pledge, as he was doing, it should not be lightly regarded. That he would either send away these troops, or wait the arrival of others, for new operations. He concluded by expressing a hope that you, sir, would in future use no reserve in communicating any subject of impropriety; and, on his part, that he should certainly do so, with due regard to the liberality of your conduct. He hoped the subject was at rest. I took my leave.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JOHN MYERS, Captain and Aid-de-Camp.

Brigadier General ROBERT B. TAYLOR, Norfolk.

Extracts of a letter from General Taylor to Sir Sidney Beckwith, Quartermaster General, commanding the land forces of his Britannic Majesty, at Hampton Roads, dated HEAD QUARTERS, July 5, 1813.

"I have now the honor to transmit to you the proceedings of the board of officers convened to inquire into the transactions at Craney Island. They doubtless will convince you that, in that affair, the American troops merited no censure; that their conduct was distinguished by humanity and magnanimity; and that the distance to which you were removed from the scene, by rendering it impossible that you could be informed of the motives of their conduct, unhappily led you to draw conclusions equally mistaken and unmerited.

"You have done me the justice to declare that the measures pursued by me evince a disposition to permit, in my troops, no abuses on humanity, or the laws of authorized war. As I cannot doubt the existence of similar sentiments with you, I have a right to expect, on your part, measures equally decisive and unambiguous. If I have deemed it needful to forbid openly, to my whole army, all acts of impropriety, and to direct a public investigation of charges believed to be unmerited, but having the sanction of your imputation, I put it to your candor to determine, if excesses in your troops, admitted by yourself, and some of them of the most atrocious character, should pass unnoticed. My conduct, and your declarations, give me a claim to ask that these excesses be punished. Your army will then learn the abhorrence you feel for such acts, and be restrained, by the fear of your indignation, from similar outrages. But if these admitted excesses are passed by, the impunity of the past will be construed, by your troops, into an encouragement of future outrages, and your own humane intentions be completely defeated. Neither can you be unmindful of the propriety of taking, from my army, the pretexes for impropriety, by a knowledge of effectual restraints on yours.

"I am fully impressed with the liberality of your conduct in promising to remove the troops who committed the outrages of Hampton from the opportunity of repeating these enormities. But, besides that my confidence in the gallantry of the American troops forbids me to desire any diminution of your force, and such a measure being liable to misconception, by our own troops, might not attain your object. The rank and file of an army seldom reason very profoundly, and however erroneously, might ascribe their withdrawal to the desertions which have, on every opportunity, taken place in that corps, and in their unwillingness, if any should have been displayed, to fire on the American troops. If this should unfortunately be the case, your force will be diminished, without securing the great ends of discipline and humanity for which you had, with so much liberality, made the sacrifice. I am the more pressing on this subject, because I have reason to believe that, even since your assurance, though unquestionably against your wishes, very improper acts have been committed by the troops on James river. The domestic property of peaceable private citizens, respected by all civilized nations, has been pillaged, and what furnished no allurements to cupidity has been wantonly defaced and destroyed.

"If such acts are either directed, or sanctioned, it is important to us, and to the world, to know what species of warfare the arms of Great Britain mean to wage. If authorized, it will be of little practical avail to know, that the director of these arms entertains the most liberal personal dispositions, while these dispositions remain dormant and inoperative.

"If I am troublesome on this subject, charge it to my anxious desire that nothing may occur to embitter our own feelings, and those of our respective nations. In the progress of the war, charges of inhumanity have unhappily been frequent and reciprocal. I am not indifferent to the infamy which such a charge fixes on the officer, who either encourages or permits it. I derive the highest satisfaction from the assurances you have given of similar sentiments. We have, sir, become enemies, by the sacred obligations we owe our respective countries. But, on the great and expanded subject of human happiness, we should be friends by the sympathy of our feelings. Let us then cordially unite, and exercising effectually the powers with which our Governments have invested us, give to our warfare a character of magnanimity, conferring equal honor on ourselves, and on our countries."

Extract from General Orders.

NORFOLK, Assistant Adjutant General's Office.

July 1st, 1813.

The General commanding has deemed it proper to remonstrate against the excesses committed by the British troops who took possession of Hampton. It has been attempted to justify, or palliate, these excesses; on the ground of inhumanity in some of the troops at Craney Island, who are charged with having waded into the river, and shot at the unresisting and yielding foe, who clung to the wreck of a boat which had been sunk by the fire of our guns.

Humanity and mercy are inseparable from true courage, and the General knows too well the character of the troops under his command to doubt their magnanimity towards an unresisting foe. It is equally due to the honor of the troops engaged, and to the hitherto unquestioned fame of the American arms, for honor and clemency, that the imputation should be investigated. If the charge be well founded, the army must be purified by punishment for this abomination. If, as the commander hopes and believes, the conduct of our troops has been misconceived, the world should have an authentic record to repel the imputation.

He, therefore, directs that a board of officers, to consist of Colonel Freeman, President, Lieutenant Colonels Boykin, Mason, and Read, do convene the day after to-morrow, at a place to be appointed by the President, for the purpose of investigating these charges, and report accordingly.

JAMES MAURICE, Major, Act. Ast. Ad. Gen.

The evidence having been gone through, the Board, after deliberate and mature consideration, do pronounce the following opinion:

That it appears from the testimony adduced, that, on the 23d of last month, in the action at Craney Island, two of the enemy's boats, in front of their line, were sunk by the fire of our batteries; the soldiers and sailors who were in those boats were consequently afloat, and in danger of drowning; and being in front of the boats which were uninjured, to disable these, our guns were necessarily fired in a direction of the men in the water, but with no intention whatever to do them further harm, but, on the contrary, orders were given to prevent this by ceasing to fire grape, and only to fire round shot. It also is substantiated, that one of the enemy, who had apparently surrendered, advanced towards the shore, about one hundred yards, when he suddenly turned to his right, and endeavored to make his escape to a body of the enemy who had landed above the island, and who were then in view; then, and not till then, was he fired upon, to bring him back, which had the desired effect, and he was taken unhurt to the island.

It further appears, that the troops on the island exerted themselves in acts of hospitality and kindness to the unresisting and yielding foe.

"Therefore, the Board do, with great satisfaction, declare, as their unbiassed opinion, that the charge alleged against the troops is unsupported, and that the character of the American soldiery, for humanity and magnanimity, has not been committed, but, on the contrary, confirmed."

JAMES MAURICE, Maj. Act. As. Ad. Gen.

Copy of a note from Sir Sidney Beckwith to Gen. Taylor, dated H. M. ship San Domingo, July 6, 1813.

Quarter Master General Sir Sidney Beckwith begs leave to return his best acknowledgments to Gen. Taylor for his polite communication, and to repeat his earnest wish that military operations should be carried on with all the liberality and humanity which becomes the respective nations. Any infringement of the established usages of war will instantly be noticed and punished.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General Taylor to the Secretary of War, dated

NORFOLK, 7th July, 1813.

"The Board of officers convened to examine the charge brought against our troops in the affair at Craney Island have made such a report as an American could desire. I enclosed a copy yesterday to the British commander, with a letter, of which a copy is enclosed. The bearer of my despatch was met by a flag, the officer of which received the despatch, and a few hours after returned with an answer, of which a copy is also enclosed. I fear, from the generality of its terms, that little amelioration of the system, hitherto practised, is to be expected; but something is gained by placing the enemy so decidedly in the wrong, that the world cannot doubt to whom it is to be ascribed any excesses which hereafter may be committed on either side."

Extract of an official letter, addressed by Major Crutchfield to Governor Barbour, dated,

YORK COUNTY; HALF-WAY HOUSE, June 20, 1813.

"To give you, sir, an idea of the savage-like disposition of the enemy, on their getting possession of the neighborhood, would be but a vain attempt. Although Sir Sidney Beckwith assured me that no uneasiness might be felt in relation to the unfortunate Americans, the fact is, that, on yesterday, there were several dead bodies lying unburied, and the wounded not even assisted into town, although observed to be crawling towards a cold and inhospitable protection. The unfortunate females of Hampton, who could not leave the town, were suffered to be abused in the most shameful manner, not only by the venal savage foe, but by the unfortunate and infatuated blacks, who were encouraged by them in their excesses. They pillaged, and encouraged every act of murder and rapine—killing a poor man by the name of Kirby, who had been lying on his bed at the point of death for more than six weeks; shooting his wife in the hip at the same time, and killing his faithful dog while lying under his feet. The murdered Kirby was lying, last night, weltering in his bed."

Extract of a letter from Captain Cooper of the Cavalry, to Charles K. Mallory, Esq. Lieutenant Governor of Virginia.

"I was yesterday in Hampton with my troop; that place having been evacuated in the morning by the British. My blood ran cold at what I saw and heard. The few distressed inhabitants running up in every direction to congratulate us; tears were shedding in every corner. The infamous scoundrels, monsters, destroyed every thing but the houses, and (my pen is almost unwilling to describe it) the women were ravished by the abandoned ruffians! Great God! my dear friend, can you figure to yourself our Hampton females seized and treated with violence by those monsters, and not a solitary American arm present to avengé their wrongs? But enough; I can no more of this.

"They have received a reinforcement of 2,000, in all 6,000 men; and Norfolk or Richmond is their immediate aim. Protect yourselves from such scenes as we have witnessed. They retired in great confusion, leaving behind 3,000 weight of beef, muskets, ammunition, canteens, &c. &c. and some of their men, which we took. It is supposed that they apprehended an immediate attack from 6,000 of our men, which caused them to retreat so precipitately. My friend, rest assured of one thing, that they cannot conquer Americans; they cannot stand them: if we had had 1200 men, we should have killed or taken, the greater part of them."

From the same to the same, dated

ARMISTEAD'S MILL, NEAR HAMPTON, July 10, 1813.

DEAR FRIEND:

"Your favor of the 7th has just been received through the politeness of Major Crutchfield, who had it forwarded to me at this place. I am surprised to hear that you have among you a man who would endeavor to apologize for the unprecedented villany and brutal conduct of the enemy in Hampton. Be assured of one fact, that that which I informed you of in my last was strictly true.

"You request me to make known to you a few of the distressing particulars in a way which will force conviction upon the minds of the incredulous. I will attend to it, my friend, that you may be enabled to confound such with positive proofs. At present you must content yourself with the following, and believe it as religiously as any fact beyond denial.

"Mrs. Turnbull was pursued up to her waist in the water, and dragged on shore by ten or twelve of these ruffians, who satiated their brutal desires upon her, after pulling off her clothes, stockings, shoes, &c. This was seen by your nephew Keith, and many others. Another case—a married woman, her name unknown to me, with her infant child in her arms, (the child forcibly dragged from her) shared the same fate. Two young women, well known to many, whose names will not be revealed at this time, suffered in like manner. * Doctor Colton, Parson Holson, and Mrs. Hopkins, have informed me of these particulars. Another, in the presence of old Mr. Hope, had her gown, &c. &c. cut off with a sword, and violence offered in his presence, which he endeavored to prevent, but had to quit the room, leaving the unfortunate victim in their possession, who, no doubt, was abused in the same way. Old Mr. Hope† himself was stripped naked, pricked with a bayonet in the arm, and slapped in the face; and were I to mention a hundred cases in addition to the above, I do not know that I should exaggerate."

Extract from a report made to Major Crutchfield by Thomas Griffin and Robert Lively, Esqrs. dated

YORK, 4th July, 1813.

"Upon reaching Hampton, a scene of desolation and destruction presented itself. The few inhabitants we found in town seemed not yet to have recovered from their alarm: dismay and consternation sat on every countenance: reports had reached us of the violence and uncontrolled fury of the enemy after they obtained possession of the place; their conduct, in some cases, being represented such as would have disgraced the days of Vandalism. Our feelings were much excited, and we deemed it our duty to pursue the inquiry as far as practicable, and are sorry to say, that, from all the information we could procure, from sources too respectable to permit us to doubt, we are compelled to believe that acts of violence have been perpetrated, which have disgraced the age in which we live. The sex, hitherto guarded by the soldier's honor, escaped not the rude assaults of superior force; nor could disease disarm the foe of his ferocity. The apology, that these atrocities were committed by the French soldiers attached to the British forces now in our waters, appears to us no justification of those who employed them, believing, as we do, that an officer is, or should be, ever responsible for the conduct of the troops under his command."

* The former of these gentlemen acted as surgeon to the detachment lately stationed at Hampton, and is a young gentleman of the first respectability. The latter is president of the academy at that place, and stands deservedly high in public estimation. Mrs. Hopkins, also, is a lady of very high respectability, and of the most unquestionable veracity.

† This worthy old gentleman is bowing beneath the pressure of age, being near 70, or older: has a numerous family, most of them sons, now in the service of their country.

To the Editor of the Enquirer.

SIR:

Having just returned from Hampton, where I made myself acquainted with all the particulars of British outrage, whilst that place was in their possession, I am requested, by many persons, to communicate, through you, to the public, the information I have given them. I do this with no hope or expectation of satisfying those who required other testimony than Major Crutchfield's or Captain Cooper's. I too well know there are those among us, who will still doubt, or pretend to doubt. But as I believe this class to be few in number, and insignificant in the public estimation; as I firmly believe that a large majority of all political persuasions are open to conviction, and feelingly alive to their country's wrongs; I cannot withhold from them the facts, whose simple recital will, according to their different temperaments, inflame them with rage, or fill them with horror.

My name you are at liberty to give to the public, or only to those who may inquire for it, as you think proper. I have reason to believe that those who know me, whether federal or republican, will know and acknowledge that I am incapable of publishing a falsehood; and I aver, that every statement inconsistent with the following, no matter on whose authority it is made, is untrue; in proof of which I solemnly undertake, before the world, to establish every fact contained in it, provided any gentleman will sign his name to a denial of either of them.

I went to Hampton with a determination of inquiring minutely into the truth of reports, which I hoped, for the honor of a soldier's profession, and of human nature, to have found exaggerated. In the investigation, I resolved to depend on the second hand relation of no one, where I could mount to the original source of evidence; but since, in some cases, this was impracticable, I feel it a duty carefully to distinguish the one class from the other.

That the town and country adjacent was given up to the indiscriminate plunder of a licentious soldiery, except, perhaps, the house where the head quarters were fixed, is an undeniable truth. Every article of valuable property was taken from it. In many houses not even a knife, a fork, or plate was left. British officers were seen by Dr. Colton in the act of plundering a Mr. Jones's store. His house, although he remained in town, was rifled, and his medicine thrown into the public street, just opposite where many officers took up their quarters, who must have been eye-witnesses of the scene. The church was pillaged, and the plate belonging to it taken away, although inscribed with the donor's name. The wind-mills in the neighborhood were stripped of their sails. The closets, private drawers, and trunks of the inhabitants, were broken open, and scarcely any thing seemed to be too trifling an object to excite the cupidity of these robbers. Several gentlemen informed me that much of their plunder was brought into the back yard of Mrs. Westwood's house, where Sir Sidney Beckwith and Admiral Cockburn resided. But I had no opportunity of seeing this lady, who, it was said, would testify to the fact. In short, Hampton exhibits a dreary and desolate appearance, which no American can witness unmoved. Doctor Wardlaw and Mr. John G. Smith, of this city, visited it in company with me; and their indignation was equal. They, and every one who saw and heard what I have stated, united in execrating the monsters who perpetrated these enormities; and political distinctions, if any existed, were lost in the nobler feelings of pity for the sufferers, and a generous ardor to avenge their wrongs.

Here it may be necessary to notice a publication I have this moment read in the Alexandria Gazette of the 12th, where, among other things, it is said, on the authority of a "gentleman who was in Hampton the day after the evacuation by the enemy," that it was believed there "that nearly all the plundering was committed by the negroes;" and that he saw many "articles brought to the magistrates which had been secreted in negro houses." That some plundering may have been committed by the negroes, who, (as I was told) were embodied and paraded through the streets, is probable enough; that the expression of such an opinion may have been heard in Hampton is likewise probable; but I do utterly deny, that it is believed there, by any person worthy of credit, that "nearly all the plundering was committed by them." Let the gentleman; then, who gives this account, state from whom he derived his information. Let him give the names of the magistrates who received the plunder thus found, and his own; and let him declare what were the main articles he saw brought in. I will not directly hazard the assertion, but I am very much inclined to believe, there were no magistrates in the town at the time spoken of, unless Parson Holson, Dr. Colton, or Captain Wills, are magistrates; and with all these gentlemen I conversed, and heard not a whisper countenancing the statement in the Alexandria paper. How it is known that the negroes "had the address," first to impose on the British commanders, and then on the American troops, which "induced them to retreat to York," and leave Hampton to be plundered by these artful rogues, that gentleman is left to say; but that the American troops did not retire to York, in consequence of such information, is undoubtedly true. Nor is it less true that Captain Cooper's troop arrived in time to prevent any plundering of the least consequence, after the evacuation; and in time to prevent, what many gentlemen there believed to have been a plan concerted between the black and white allies—the firing of the town.

That "Admiral Warren expressed his regret that the inhabitants of Hampton had not all remained, as in that case no plundering would have happened," is possible enough; since it admits the fact of the plundering, and is conformable with the answer given to Captain Wills, who complained to Cockburn and Beckwith of the destruction of his private property. "Why did you quit your house?" said these honorable men. "I remained in my house," answered Doctor Colton, "and have found no better treatment."

That Kirby, who, for seven weeks or more, had been confined to his bed, and whose death the savages only a little hastened, was shot in the arms of his wife, is not denied. Those who wish for further confirmation may go and take him from his grave, and weep, if they can feel for an American citizen, over his mangled body. They may go to his wounded wife, and hear her heart-rending tale, and then they may turn to the account of the gentleman, and derive consolation from the excuse (which I never heard) "that it was done in revenge for the refusal of the militia to give quarter to some Frenchmen, who were on board a barge that was sunk by our troops, who continued to fire on the almost drowning men, when making for the shore." This vile slander on our troops will, I have no doubt, be met, in the proper manner, by the gallant officer who commands them at Norfolk. But the worst is to come.

I conversed with a lady whose name is mentioned in Captain Cooper's letter, in company with Parson Holson, Doctor Colton, and Captain Wills. Her story was too shocking in its details to meet the public eye. When I had convinced her of the object I had in view in visiting her—that it was dictated by no impertinent curiosity, but a desire to know the whole truth, to enable me, on the one hand, to do justice even to an enemy, or, on the other, to electrify my countrymen with the recital of her sufferings, she discovered every thing which her convulsive struggles between shame and a desire to expose her brutal assailants would permit. This woman was seized by five or six ruffians, some of them dressed in red and speaking correctly the English language, and stripped naked. Her cries and her prayers were disregarded, and her body became the subject of the most abominable indecencies. She at one time made her escape, and ran into a creek hard by, followed by a young daughter; whence she was dragged by the monsters in human shape, to experience new and aggravated suffering. In this situation she was kept the whole night, whilst her screams were heard at intervals by some of the Americans in town, who could only clasp their hands in hopeless agony.

Virginian! American! Friend or enemy of the administration, or of the war! go, as I have done, to this woman's house, and hear and see her. See too her young daughter on the bed of sickness, in consequence of the abuses of that night! and your heart, if it be made of "penetrable stuff," will throb with indignation, and a thirst for revenge, and your hand instinctively grasp the weapon for inflicting it.

A Mrs. Briggs related to us, that a woman who had come to Hampton, to visit her husband, who was in the militia, was taken forcibly from her side by four soldiers in green, and with her young child, which one of them snatched from her arms, borne to the hospital, in spite of her screams. They had previously robbed them of their rings, and attempted to tear open their bosoms. A Mrs. Hopkins, who was not in town when I was there, obtained the assistance of an officer, and rescued the woman from her ravishers, but not until one of them had gratified his abominable desires. I was told by the gentleman who accompanied me, that Mrs. Hopkins confirmed this statement, and would swear to at least two other cases of a similar kind, without, however, giving up the names of the young and respectable women who suffered.

Doctor Colton and Captain Mills, assisted by an officer, rescued another lady from the greatest of all calamities.

Old Mr. Hope, aged, as he told Major Crutchfield, (in my presence) sixty-four or five years, was seized by the wretches and stripped of all his clothing, even of his shoes and his shirt. A bayonet was run a little way into his arm behind, as if in cruel sport; while several were held to his breast. In this situation he was kept for a considerable time, and would probably have been another victim of their rage, if their attention had not been diverted to a woman, who had sought refuge in his house. They followed her into the kitchen, whither she had run for safety. Mr. Hope made off amidst her agonizing screams, and when he returned to his house, he was told by his domestics that their horrid purposes were accomplished. This I had from him.

How far this violation extended will never be known. Women will not publish what they consider their own shame, and the men in town were carefully watched and guarded. But enough is known to induce the belief of the existence of many other cases, and enough to fire every manly bosom with the irreplaceable desire of revenge.

I am not disposed to tire the public patience, or I could tell of enormities little inferior to the above. But the enemy are convicted of robbery, rape, and murder, and it is unnecessary to add to the catalogue of their crimes.

Men of Virginia! will you permit all this? Fathers, and brothers, and husbands, will you fold your arms in apathy, and only curse your despoilers? No, you will fly with generous emulation to the unfurled standard of your country. You will imitate the example of those generous spirits who are, even now, in crowds, tendering their services to the commander-in-chief; who are pouring from their native mountains, and soliciting to be led against the enemy wherever he dares to show his face. You will prove yourselves worthy of the immortal honor that the enemy has conferred upon you in selecting you as the object of his vengeance. You will neglect, for a time, all civil pursuits and occupations, and devote yourselves to the art, a knowledge of which the enemy has made necessary. You will learn to command; to obey; and, with "Hampton" as your watch word—to conquer.

SIR:

YORK, July 4, 1813.

Anxious to effect, as early as possible, the objects of the flag entrusted to us by you on the 1st instant, we proceeded, immediately after receiving your despatches for Admiral Warren and General Taylor, to Hampton. On our arrival at the latter place, some difficulty arose in procuring a vessel to convey us to the British fleet; and after some delay, we were compelled to embark in a small, open, four oared boat, the only one, it seemed, which the fury of the enemy had left capable of floating. We proceeded to the fleet of the enemy with the utmost despatch which our little skiff, and the excessive heat of the day, would permit; and when distant from the Admiral's ship about a half mile, were met and hailed by a barge of the enemy, the officer of which was informed we had despatches for Admiral Warren. We were invited into the barge, which invitation we accepted, as well to relieve ourselves from the confinement on board our little vessel, to lighten as much as possible the burthen of our oarsmen, and to proceed with as much expedition as was practicable to obtain the objects of our mission. On our arrival at the Admiral's ship (the San Domingo) we were directed to proceed to the "Sceptre," a line of battle ship, on which we were informed Admiral Cockburn had recently hoisted his flag. Arriving along side of this ship we were desired by the officer of the barge to ascend the ship. Upon our reaching the deck, we found a large assemblage of officers—certainly a greater number than could be necessarily attached to a single ship. In the space of ten minutes the two Admirals, Warren and Cockburn, approached; to the former, we delivered our despatches, who, upon perusal, evinced embarrassment, and after a short pause, said, that the principal object of the flag appeared to be to procure supplies for your hospital. He was answered in the affirmative. Could not these supplies have been as easily and early procured from Richmond as from Norfolk? We thought not. The Admiral then said he would reflect upon the subject, and return us an answer soon, and retired with Admiral Cockburn to the cabin of the ship. A period of about fifteen minutes then elapsed, when Admiral Cockburn advanced, and addressing Major Griffin, informed him, that the Admiral would see him in the cabin: Upon Major Griffin's reaching the cabin, the two Admirals only with him, Admiral Warren again repeated the opinion, that the hospital supplies could be as expeditiously procured from Richmond, as from Norfolk, saying, it was contrary to their regulations to permit even a flag to go to Norfolk; that it was their intention to land Mr. King, who went with the flag, at Seawall's point, and jointly with Admiral Cockburn, expressed an unwillingness to permit the flag to proceed. They were answered, that if the flag was permitted to proceed, the supplies could be procured sooner than if the flag was compelled to return, certainly in the course of the following day; that if compelled to resort to Richmond, three days, probably more, would pass before the stores could reach Hampton; that our wounded and sick were suffering for medicine and necessaries; that all the medicine, private as well as public property, had been wantonly destroyed by the troops who lately captured Hampton; and that the supplies absolutely required for the use of the hospital could not be procured in Hampton. The Admiral said he had heard that the hospitals had received some supplies. He was asked from whence, and assured it was not the case. Finding the Admiral still hesitating, Major Griffin said, "that the reputed humanity of Admiral Warren forbid Major Crutchfield to doubt that the application for the passage of a flag to Norfolk would be refused." After a short pause Major Griffin was informed that the flag might proceed, upon condition of returning along-side the ship, in the same vessel, with the same persons, and with no increase of persons. The restriction to the same vessel was combated, on the ground that, in the event of much wind, the boat was too small to navigate the roads, and thus the object of the flag would be defeated. But finding no relaxation in the condition probable, it was determined, upon consultation with Lieutenant Lively, to proceed. Upon the subject of prisoners, Admiral Warren acknowledged one only to be in the fleet, taken at Hampton. He declined all arrangement, and avoided all discussion on this topic, saying he had opened a correspondence with General Taylor, but nothing was decided. Relative to the officers' baggage captured in Hampton, the Admiral said that such articles as had been found had been restored, and mentioned the papers of Captain Pryor, which had been placed in the care of Captain Myers of Norfolk, and assured Major Griffin that he would direct Sir Sidney Beckwith to inquire farther, and if any should be discovered it would be made known to us on our return. We were then informed we might proceed, which we immediately did, and reaching Norfolk after 3 P. M. repaired to General Taylor's quarters, who directed the supplies written for by the surgeons. Returning on the 2d, we were, as customary, again met by a barge of the enemy, and desired to call on board the Admiral's ship; we entered the ship with the officer of the barge, and were received by the Captain, who inquired if we had despatches for the Admiral. Being informed we were the returning flag that had proceeded to Norfolk the day before, the Captain retired to the cabin, and shortly returned with information that we might proceed when we pleased; this we did; and deposited with Doctor Colton the medical and hospital supplies sent from Norfolk.

Upon our reaching Hampton a scene of desolation and destruction presented itself. The few inhabitants we found in town seemed not yet to have recovered from their alarm; dismay and consternation sat on every countenance. Reports had reached us of the violence and uncontrolled fury of the enemy after they obtained possession of the place; their conduct, in some cases, being represented such as would have disgraced the days of Vandalism. Our feelings were much excited, and we deemed it our duty to pursue the inquiry as far as practicable, and are sorry to say, that, from all the information we could procure, from sources too respectable to permit us to doubt, we are compelled to believe that acts of violence have been perpetrated, which have disgraced the age in which we live. The sex, hitherto guarded by the soldier's honor, escaped not the rude assaults of superior force; nor could disease disarm the foe of his ferocity. The apology that these atrocities were committed by the French soldiers attached to the British forces now in our waters appeared to us no justification of those who employed them, believing, as we do, that an officer is, or should be, ever responsible for the conduct of the troops under his command.

We have the honor to be, your humble servants,

THOMAS GRIFFIN,
ROBERT LIVELY.

To Major CRUTCHFIELD, Commandant, York.

*Believed, upon good authority, to be Colonel Richard E. Parker, of Westmoreland county, Virginia.

ADDENDA.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 30, 1813.

From William Berry, Midshipman in the Frigate Chesapeake.

SIR:

I consider myself bound to lay before you what came under my knowledge while on board the Chesapeake, as well as on board the Shannon.

After the enemy had complete possession of the ship, Midshipmen Randolph and Flushman were ordered from the fore and main top. In coming down the shrouds Lieutenant Faulkner (the British officer) said to his men, kill those damned rascals. Then, and immediately, several muskets were discharged at them, but without effect. My station was in the mizen top, where I had an opportunity of seeing their actions. I was looking on deck when I saw one of the Chesapeake's men crawling along, attempting to get below, with one of his legs off. One of the enemy stepped up to him with his cutlass, and immediately put an end to his existence. Lieutenant Faulkner looked up in the mizen top; pointing at me, said he to his men, go up three of you and throw that damned Yankee overboard. They immediately rushed up, seizing me by the collar; now, said they, you damned Yankee, you shall swim for it, attempting to throw me overboard; but I got within the rigging, when one of them kicked me in the breast, which was the cause of my falling; being stunned by the fall, I lay some time senseless, and, when I came too, I was cut over the head with a cutlass, which nearly terminated my existence. Eleven of our midshipmen were confined in a small place, nine feet by six, with an old sail to lay on, and a guard at the door, until a day or two before our arrival at Halifax; and, likewise, eleven of us upon five rations, and some days only one meal. Our clothes were taken on board of the Shannon; Lieutenant Wallis, the commanding officer on board, would not let us take our clothes below with us, but pledged his word and honor as an officer, we should receive our clothes. But we discovered, next morning, that their midshipmen had on our clothes and side arms. We were conversing together respecting our clothes—one of their midshipmen overheard our conversation, and made a report to the Lieutenant commanding. He then sent word to us that if we said any thing more about the clothes, he would put us in the fore-hold with the men. We expected to receive our clothes when we arrived in port, but, I assure you, sir, nothing was ever restored. Other rascally things occurred, which our officers will, when they return, make known to the public, disgraceful to a civilized nation. If your request could have been made sooner, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect,

Honorable L. CONDUCT, Washington.

WILLIAM BERRY.

Another circumstance took place on board, which entirely escaped my memory until this moment. Several of the officers had money taken from them which they received from the Chesapeake as prize money. Mr. Higginbotham, as nearly as I can recollect, had upwards of one hundred and thirty dollars.

GEORGETOWN, July 30th, 1813.

SIR:

Having perused a letter of yours to Mr. Berry, requesting information respecting the treatment of the American officers and seamen of the late Chesapeake, I consider myself bound, sir, to lay before you what came under my knowledge. My having been wounded, and remaining on board the Chesapeake, might not give me that scope for observation which others possessed; but, I am sorry to say, many things transpired disgraceful to the character of a brave enemy. Whilst undressing myself in the steerage, after the Americans were driven below or had surrendered, and after resistance had ceased, I believe entirely, several muskets and pistols were at once pointed down the hatchway, and discharged in the direction of the cockpit; and as the steerage and cockpit were filled with the wounded, in all probability some of them were killed outright. It was Midshipman Hopewell, and not Livingston, who was so inhumanly treated, as described in the public prints. It has been the custom in our navy to take the side-arms of officers, (prisoners) but to restore them on their leaving the ship. Ours were taken, worn, and never restored, together with what nautical instruments they could lay their hands on. When spoken to by the American officers on the subject, the answer was, such things were free plunder. A day or two after the action, I was conversing with Lieutenant Budd and Mr. Nicholls, near the taffarel, respecting the engagement, when it was observed some of the Shannon's men were listening to our conversation. Immediately after, Lieutenant Faulkner, the commanding officer, ordered sentinels to be placed at the mizen mast; and, said he to them, if you see any of the Chesapeake's officers abaft the mizen mast, cut them down; if you see them conversing together, cut them down without hesitation. It will be remembered the three officers who caused this order were all severely wounded. We received no caution and overheard it by accident. So great was the rage for plunder, that Captain Lawrence, before his death, could not obtain a bottle of wine from his private sea stores, without a note from the doctor to the Lieutenant commanding. I pass over the robbing of the midshipmen on board the Shannon, as it did not come under my immediate notice. If your request could have been made earlier, I should have felt gratified in making a fuller statement.

Yours, respectfully,

WM. A. WEAVER.

Honorable LEWIS CONDUCT, Washington.

[1st SESSION.]

ADDITIONAL FORTIFICATIONS, AND AN INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, AUGUST 1, 1813.

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, Monday, 30th May, 1813.

SIR:

I am directed by the committee of the Senate to whom was referred so much of the message of the President as relates to the military establishment, to inquire of you what provision has been made, by your Department, for the protection and defence of the seaboard of the United States; whether the protection authorized by law is deemed sufficient; if not, what further or other provision is considered necessary; whether any, and, if any, what, modification of the military establishment, or extension thereof, is deemed expedient. I am also directed to ask you to give the committee such information, in relation to any other specific objects in your Department, as you may deem proper to be communicated, or which may require legislative provision.

Accept assurances of my high respect.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, Chairman.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 10th, 1813.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, written by direction of the Committee of the Senate "to whom was referred so much of the message of the President as relates to the military establishment;" and inquiring

What provision had been made by the War Department for the protection of the seaboard?

Whether the protection authorized by law be deemed sufficient? And, if not; What further or other provision be considered necessary?

Whether any, and, if any, what, modification or extension of the military establishment be deemed expedient? and What other specific objects within my Department may require legislative provision?

To these questions I beg leave to reply:

1st. That, so far as the defence of the seaboard depends on troops, the statement I had the honor to make to you yesterday will be found to contain an appropriate answer to the first question. It but remains, therefore, to present a table of the posts, the number and caliber of the cannon, and of the quantity of ammunition, at each of these. This will be found in the documents enclosed, numbered 1, 2, 3.*

2d. That, in my opinion, the present protection of the seaboard is not sufficient, and that the measures to be taken for its better defence are of two kinds: additional fortifications, and an increased number of regular troops.

Under the former of these heads, it is proposed to erect a work, of earth, (or of more durable materials, if found advisable) on a small island of the Delaware, called the Pea Patch. The plan and extent of the work will be adapted to the relation which the island bears to the shores and channel of the Delaware; and, from the survey made, it is believed that the work will completely cover both. The situation of the island is eight miles below New Castle.

A work of the same description at Hawkins's Point, near Baltimore.

A work on Maryland Point, or on that called Cedar Shoal Point, on the Potomac. It cannot be doubted but that the seat of the National Government should be placed, not merely beyond injury, but beyond disturbance, from an enemy.

A work on Craney Island, for the better protection of Norfolk, has been commenced, and is mentioned here but from a belief that the importance of the position will be found to justify an extension of the present plan.

At Charleston, or its dependencies, some covering works have been projected, but want of funds has hitherto prevented their execution.

Savannah is believed to be a position which, from various causes, is more exposed than any other, and upon the defence of which, few expenditures of public money have been made. It is, therefore, proposed to protect it by a chain of redans on three of its sides, and, on the fourth, which is understood to be the most vulnerable, by a few redoubts, connected by a ditch and parapet, &c. &c.

No additional work at New Orleans is thought necessary. One, of regular form, and of considerable extent, has been recently erected on the Eastern bank of the Mississippi, at the Detour l'Anglais, and a second has been projected for commanding the entrance from the sea into lake Pontchartrain. When these are finished, the defence of New Orleans from exterior attacks, and by means of fixed batteries, may be considered as complete.

Under the second general provision, (an increased number of regular troops) I offer the following arrangement of permanent garrisons, viz:

To districts No. 1 and 2,	-	-	-	-	2,000 men.
To do. do. 3 and 4,	-	-	-	-	3,000
To do. do. 5,	-	-	-	-	3,000
To do. do. 6,	-	-	-	-	2,000
To do. do. 7,	-	-	-	-	3,000

3d. In fulfilling the arrangement stated in the preceding article, it will be necessary to organize the whole number of the twenty regiments authorized to be raised during the last session of Congress. Of these regiments fifteen have been already set on foot, including ten companies of rangers, intended for the defence of the territories of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. It is respectfully proposed that the remaining five be also raised expressly for the defence of other and particular points, and that their service be made commensurate with the war. Corps of this description may be promptly obtained, and made to take a very efficient character. This is the only modification of the present military establishment which is believed to be necessary. An extension of it, called for as well by justice as by policy, is the establishment of an invalid corps. Instances of partial decrepitude have been much multiplied by the events of the last and present campaigns, and can best be relieved by an establishment which but demands from the sufferer a service proportioned to his physical ability, and which, while it gives occupation, guarantees against want.

4th. Some minor and insulated subjects require legislative notice and provision.

1. The law creating the ordnance department provides for four deputy commissaries. It is proposed to authorize the President to add five other deputies. This will enable the head of that department to assign to each military district, one deputy, who shall establish and superintend a laboratory within the same, and thus do away the expence and risk of transmitting fixed ammunition from one district to another.

2. Aids-de-camp are now taken from the line of the army, in all cases; as are assistant adjutants and inspectors general, and (in many cases) their principals; and, also, the paymasters of districts. These multiplied draughts upon the line are found to have a bad effect, and the more so, as officers of the greatest intelligence are generally selected to fill these appointments. It is therefore proposed that general officers be permitted to select their aids from the mass of citizens, and that the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a captain of cavalry be given to each aid-de-camp, so long as he be continued as such.

3. No provision is made by law for paying money to officers of light dragoons and light artillery, in lieu of forage, when not drawn in kind.

4. The provisions of the act of the 6th of July, 1812, in relation to the price to be allowed in lieu of forage not drawn in kind, by officers of certain grades, appear to be contradictory.

5. The United States possess, in fee simple, sundry lots of ground in Pittsburg. It is understood that, if these were divided into smaller lots, and sold at public sale, they would bring not less than forty thousand dollars—a sum which would be competent to establish a laboratory near that place, on a scale proportioned to all the demands of the West, Southwest, and Northwest. A law will be necessary to make such sale.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

HON. JOSEPH ANDERSON, Esq. Chairman, &c. &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 18th, 1813.

SIR:

The following report, additional to that made on the 10th instant, on the subject of an increased seaboard defence, is respectfully submitted to the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the military establishment.

Our Atlantic towns and cities furnish, respectively, a large number of seafaring men, who, from their hardihood, and habits of life, might be very usefully employed in the defence of the seaboard, particularly in the management of great guns, whether in fixed or in floating batteries, or in those of position. A corps of great efficiency might be formed out of these men, and on terms much more economical than those necessary to obtain soldiers of the line.

* Not on file.

Their term of service need not exceed eight months in each year, viz: from the month of March to that of December. They may be had at the rate of twelve dollars per month (if subsisted) and without expense on account of clothing.

1,000 sea fencibles, at $12 per month, each, is, per month.	$12,000
8 months, at $12,000, per month, is	96,000
Subsistence for term aforesaid, is	36,600
Pay and subsistence of officers, viz: 10 captains, 10 first lieutenants, 10 second lieutenants, and 10 third lieutenants, is	12,952
Total,	$145,552

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Honorable JOSEPH ANDERSON, Esq.

Chairman, &c. &c. Senate United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 12th, 1813.

SIR:

In reply to the inquiry of the honorable the Senate, viz: "What preparations have been made, and are now in readiness, for the defence of the navy yard and other public property in the city of Washington, in case it should be assailed by the enemy?" I have the honor to report that, on the water line, the means of defence are of two kinds, naval and military; that there are of the former, one frigate, two schooners, and three gunboats, so stationed as to co-operate with Fort Washington; that this fort and its covering work have been recently put into a state of thorough repair, are well equipped with heavy cannon, furnaces, &c. &c., and are now occupied by a competent garrison of United States' artificers; that, to any attempts on the land side, we can oppose the 10th, 36th, 35th, and a detachment from the 5th, regiments of infantry, and one battalion of militia; the whole amounting to 1,600 effectives. That the navy yard and marine establishment can furnish an additional defence of nearly one battalion; that two companies of light artillery have been organized, under an officer of much experience, and are supplied with cannon, caissons, &c.; that several uniformed corps are in weekly drill, and ready for service the moment that a call upon them shall become necessary; that, within the District alone, we may count on an additional force of nearly twelve hundred effective militia, and that a competent supply of arms, and of fixed and loose ammunition, has been placed within their reach.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The Chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate of the United States.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 26th, 1813.

SIR:

I beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Military Committee of the Senate, a copy of a letter from Commodore Chauncey to the Secretary of the Navy, having relation to the subject submitted in my letter of the 19th instant. Mr. Stacey has been discharged, on the ground that a citizen cannot be considered as a spy.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Military Committee Senate United States.

U. S. SHIP MADISON, Sackett's Harbor, July 4, 1813.

SIR:

On the 1st instant I caused Mr. Samuel Stacey to be apprehended as a spy. Mr. Stacey lives upon the St. Lawrence, a few miles below Ogdensburg, and I have the most positive information that he has been in the habit of conveying information to the enemy for many months. He visited this place a few days before the British made the attack on the 29th of May, and I have no doubt but that he is the person that gave the information that most of the troops had been sent to Niagara. I had information from the person that I employ on the other side that this man would visit the Harbor about the last of June. He was accordingly watched. When he left Ogdensburg, he said he was going to Utica upon important business. He told others that he was going into the Western country to collect money, instead of which, he came to the Harbor, without any ostensible business, and made a great many inquiries respecting the fleet: when they would sail? and the force of the new ship? &c. &c. I therefore thought it my duty to detain this man for trial. I can prove his frequent intercourse with the enemy. At any rate I shall deprive the enemy of the information which he could have conveyed to him, which is all important at this time.

It would be very desirable to hang this traitor to his country, as he is considered respectable in the country in which he lives; and I think that it is full time to make an example of some of our countrymen, who are so base and degenerate as to betray their country by becoming the spies and informers of our enemy. I hope the steps which I have taken, with respect to Mr. Stacey, will meet with your approbation.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ISAAC CHAUNCEY.

The Honorable WILLIAM JONES, Secretary of the Navy, Washington.
